Nearly two years after the takeover of the New Africa House protesting campus racism, the promises made by the University administration have not all been met, several students charged yesterday.

In a letter sent to protestors in February, 1988, Chancellor Duffey promised that the New Africa House would become and remain a cultural base for Afro-American students.

In addition the letter states: "Furnished offices on the fourth floor of New Africa House will be made available for use by Third World student organizations. A committee of Afro-American faculty and students will determine the appropriate use of this space."

Traci Davis, student government president and past occupier of the New Africa House, said the problems began last semester when the Banneker computer facility was installed on the fourth floor of the building. The hours for the computer lab were originally scheduled in conflict with classes, remaining closed weekends, she said. Even after lab hours were extended until 10 p.m. on weekdays, the hours were not convenient for students who needed to use the room, or study on the fourth floor.

Because the lab is situated in the middle of the fourth floor, she said, the door to access the floor has been locked preventing students who have keys to other offices from using them.

The Afro-American Studies department has not been in cooperative in resolving the problem, Davis said. "I have lost faith in the Afro-Am department around the New Africa House issue," she said.

Ernie Allen, Afro-American studies professor, said student groups knew and agreed upon the hours that the floor would be available.

Saying that the floor has been locked for security reasons, Allen said, "Students do not and will not get keys to the door of a $70,000 computer lab."

Ann Quinley, Dean of Academic Support Services said the dispute lies in the fact that no one is really sure who controls the building.

"We have legitimately conflicting interests," she said. "The Afro-Am department is concerned about the Benneker facility and the students have legitimate interest i[illegible]ng their offices. No point of compr[illegible] has been reached."

Rudy Krigger, a member of the Pan African student association who was among the protesters said, "After the New Africa House takeover, it was agreed that space would be made available on the fourth floor of the New Africa House for students."

"But lately," he said, "there have been tremendous difficulties with Afro-Am and the administration."

Krigger, whose office is on the fourth floor of the New Africa House, said the department has taken away student control and access to the floor.

Police get tips on goods

Students may have purchased stolen items

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN

University of Massachusetts students who have recently found "bargain" prices for television sets, answering machines, stereos and other equipment may have made a "bad investment," said Arthur Hilson, director of Public Safety.

Hilson has received tips that several UMass students have obtained or purchased some equipment stolen from McNamara Residence Hall between Jan. 28 and 29.

"We don't want to arrest students," he said. "We just want to resolve this problem."

Hilson suggested that students voluntarily return the goods to the department of Public Safety or to the Office of Student Affairs, saying that no questions will be asked.

If equipment is not returned, Hilson said he will be forced to follow through on the tips.

"We have begun identifying some of the students," he said, warning that search warrants will be obtained for a "sweep" of the dormitories to recover the merchandise if no students come forward.

Some of the equipment stolen from McNamara included: eight answering machines, five computers and printers, two microwaves, two video-cassette recorders, two television sets and a stereo system including a turntable, cassette player, and compact disc player, police said.

This weekend Robert W. Gonzales, 27 and Richard S. Harrison, 24, of Riverglade Apartments pleaded innocent to 16 charges of breaking and entering, larceny, and receiving stolen property.

Student leaders investigated

By LISA SHAPIRO

Four University of Massachusetts student leaders have been under investigation for possible Student Government Association and Student Code of Conduct violations by the Student Attorney General's office since Monday, according to top SGA officials.

Student Government Association President Traci Davis named Brian Crawford, Ted Chambers and Robert Smith, governing board members of the Commuter Area Government, and Student Trustee Eric Nakajima as students under investigation.

Student Attorney General Jonathan Anastas confirmed the names and said the students were being investigated for "the misuse of capital equipment for political ends."

Of the ongoing investigation, Anastas said, "I need to emphasize that they are presumed innocent and that our responsibilities end with the enforcement of these policies directly related to the SGA.

"Every undergraduate pays a student activity fee. A portion of their money, even though very small, is allegedly being used to make political decisions potentially contrary to those student's own views. "Considering the multi-jurisdictional aspects of this case, we have fulfilled our obligation to the students of this university and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by notifying the proper authorities as to the alleged behavior of certain student leaders. We are in the process of identifying our options and recourses.

"There are state agencies that deal with this type of alleged behavior," which is "unethical at best," Anastas said. Smith and Nakajima, who both ran on the Evelyn Murphy slate as delegates to the state gubernatorial Democratic Nominating de Klerk called ‘courageous‘

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Nelson Mandela called President F.W. de Klerk's concessions to the anti-apartheid movement "courageous" but he does not believe they will lead to talks between guerrillas and the government, a Mandela associate said yesterday.

The Rev. Allan Boesak, president of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, met with Mandela today.

Later, Boesak said the jailed African national Congress leader described de Klerk's speech on Friday - during which he legalized the ANC and lifted many emergency restrictions - as "bold, courageous and hopeful."

He also said that although Mandela has presented demands to the government, he will accept freedom whether or not they are met. "His release is not in his own hands," Boesak said. "It is the responsibility of the South African government to release him"

But Mandela does not believe the speech cleared the way for negotiations, Boesak said. He "has not given up on any of his principles," Boesak added.

Gorbachev caught in the middle

MOSCOW (AP) — Mikhail S. Gorbachev's daring plan for ending the party's monopoly on power came under fire today by reformers who said it was not radical enough and hard-liners who denounced its repudiation of the past.

Gorbachev on Monday opened a pivotal session of the Central Committee by proposing the party be forced to compete with other parties for the right to lead the country.

At today's session, a majority of members appeared opposed to ending the party's constitutionally guaranteed dominance, a participant said.

'The majority of the members believe that no laws and no changes in the constitution should shut off the authority of the party," said party official Ivan Shinkevich.

But other participants and observers said it appeared that a majority of delegates to the 249-member committee would indeed approve Gorbachev's proposal to change the constitution to eliminate the party's leading role in society.

Shinkevich, a member of the party's Auditing Commission interviewed when he stepped out onto Red Square during a break in the closed meeting in the Kremlin, said the session adjourned for the night instead of concluding as scheduled on Tuesday, because committees were still working out conflicts on Gorbachev's platform proposal.

Some speakers at today's Central Committee session criticized the platform as too tame, saying it was "based on old dogmas," said Alexander Fomin, a coal miner invited as a guest to the meeting. Coal miners have staged strikes and have been among the most vocal critics of the government.

"There were not enough radical proposals to solve the party's problems," Fomin said, summarizing today's debate during a break in the closed-door session.

He did not detail the objections, and the Soviet media carried no details of today's session.

Hard-line Politburo member Yegor K. Ligachev criticized Gorbachev's reform program, particularly in the economy, according to Shinkevich. Ligachev is a proponent of traditional collective farming.

Ligachev pointed out shortcomings of the leaderships's policies but did not propose solutions, Fomin said.

Another speaker, Yevgeny P. Velikhov, said he would rather see the Communist Party's monopoly on power end through a split into two competing Communist parties. Velikhov, the vice-president of the Academy of Sciences, said this would be better than a party that competes with Communists, according to a Tass transcript released late in the day.

Students set precedent in town select board race

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Brian Crawford and Robert Smith are setting a new precedent by being the first students from the University of Massachusetts to run for the position of selectman in the past 15 years, according to Cornelia Como, Amherst Town Clerk.

In the 14 years she has worked as town clerk, Como said she cannot think of any other UMass students who have run for this office.

Como said many students have been Town meeting members, but affiliation with town politics have ended there. She said student involvement with politics usually increases or decreases depending on the issues involved.

She said almost 4000 students registered to vote last fall on campus, so a large student-voter turn out would be helpful for Crawford and smith, but added "anything's possible."

Como said any students that have not yet registered to vote can do so Monday through Friday, 8:30 to 4:30 at the Town Clerk's Office in Town Hall.

Amherst Selectman Edith L. Wilkinson said she has seen an increase in student involvement in politics in the past two years due to a more vocal student population.

"Last year we had a large increase of students wanting to become Town meeting members due to the zoning ordinance for the fraternities and sororities," Wilkinson said.

Wilkinson said students can have a "definite and positive" effect on town government and said Crawford and Smith may be opening the door to a new trend in local politics.

William Field, Moderator of the Amherst select board, said the position could serve to annunciate the needs of students, but added this would apply primarily to the needs of off-campus students.

"The select board act collectively as mayor of the town, they're the executives of the town and make important decisions in hiring and budgeting, they can also be spokesman for important issues as well." Field said.

According to Field, for students to initiate new policies, they need to be involved at all levels of local government.

He said currently students participate at low level of local politics and said he would like to see an increase in student participation.

Amherst Select Board begins work on 1991 town budget

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Select Board began the long and complicated process on Monday night of creating a 1991 town budget to present to the Town Meeting on March 26.

"It's an extremely difficult time for the town now," said Barry L. Del Castilho, town manager. "And the state budget crisis with its effect on local aid is not making matters any easier." If the statewide budget crisis is not resolved, the town of Amherst, which now has a $39.5 million budget, could suffer a $3 million cut in local aid issued in June.

The town could make up $2 million of the cut from its free cash reserves, Del Castilho said, but if further cuts from the state or unanticipated expenses occur, the town would have no reserves to work with.

Del Castilho also said there was a possibility that some street lights may be turned off to save money. The budget as it stands now includes no new police or fire positions, but allocates $104,163 for additional facility operating expenses associated with the police department's new station.

After hearing from several members of the planning board, the Board decided to fund the position of Land Use Planner although it was not in the preliminary budget.

The Board heard from several human service agencies funded, at least in part, by the town and asked for continued town funding.

Phil Hasbrouck, a board member of Survivor Center, Inc., that helps provide food and second-hand clothing for those in need said that the town's funding is essential for his organization.

"We receive $6800 from the county and $3000 from the town," he said. "And the people we serve are the most desperate of the community."

Nancy Braxton of Necessities/Necesidades, a battered women's shelter, said that the town's support of $3000 is especially important in light of reduced state support

"The town's support is an important portion of our budget and with the state cutting our support, we need everything," she said.

UMass career center expanded

Job fair kicks off a full week of activities

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The newly expanded Mather Career Center at the University of Massachusetts will introduce itself to the campus with a program of events titled "Career Week: Careers on the Cutting Edge."

The program, which begins Wednesday Feb. 14 with the annual Placement Services Career Fair, will offer daily events such as panel discussions focusing on socially responsible and international careers and offer students an opportunity to meet and talk with a variety of prospective employers.

The Director of the new Career Center, Joan Stoia, said the week's events will demonstrate the effectiveness of combining the placement and cooperative education programs on campus to help launch careers in industry.

The job fair is expected to attract 60 employer organizations and more than 2,000 students. In the past, she said, the program has aided approximately 50 percent of participants in finding summer co-op placements.

Both the week-long program and the new services at the center are geared to humanities and art majors who are not eager, technically or ethically, to break into the corporate world, she said.

"We're trying to say that there are ways to combine this type of education to help the social good," Stoia said.

Most of the week's events will be held in the Campus Center.

Ethnoviolence workshop to be held

By MICHAEL WESTER
Collegian Staff

A workshop designed to help administrators, staff and students of the University of Massachusetts prevent and respond to ethnoviolence and racism on campus will be held tomorrow from 1-5 p.m. in the Campus Center reading room.

The workshop, entitled 'Strategies for Promoting Intergroup Harmony' is sponsored by the Office of Third World Affairs as part of African American History Month.

Sherwood Anderson, the Director of OTWA, organized the workshop.

"We're looking at a range of topics," he said. "The workshop will address the nature and impact of racial incidents on college campuses, and teach individual and institutional strategies for preventing racism and racial violence."

"We hope to impart some basic skills on how to deal more effectively with issues of racial intolerance. This is a problem that requires a contiuous effort. It is still with us."

The worksop will be presented by Joan C. Weiss and Adele Dutton Terell, two administrators from the National Institute Against Prejudice and Violence, a non-profit organization based in Baltimore, Maryland.

Weiss, Executive Director of the institute, has conducted various training workshops across the country, and was the 1984 winner of the United Nations Human Rights award. Terell, the program diector of the institue, has similar workshop experience.

The workshop is limited to 40 participants, and anyone intersted in attending is urged to contact Anderson at OTWA. Sherwood said that a similar workshop is scheduled for the spring.

Health Services

Effective January 29, 1990

Dear Student Health Plan and Family Plan Members:

The University Health Services is pleased to announce that the Student Health Fee for spring semester 1990 will not be increased. Services will also not be reduced.

However, in order to do this we will need to institute an increase in copayments for three services for all student health plan members who pay the Basic Student Health Fee or belong to our Student Family Plan and related special plans. The new copayments are:

1. Pharmacy - three-tiered system of $5, $7, and $15.
2. Dental Care - full charges for routine and preventive care.
3. Eye Care - complete optometric examination charge of $40.

These changes are directly related to the state budget deficit, since we have been notified that beginning January 1, 1990 UHS will be charged full fringe benefits costs for its employees. This amounts to $1.5 million per year, or $750,000 unexpected unbudgeted costs for Spring 1990. Through staff attrition and a tighter budget we can absorb about 50% of this amount. However, a $350,000 deficit remains. The increased copayments will cover most of this.

We regret that we have to make this change so suddenly.

Sincerely,

David P. Kraft

These groups don't work with sneakers or oil paint; they canvass with a double "s."

Canvassing, a door-to-door campaigning technique, is the life line of environmental groups Clean Water Action, Greenpeace Action, and the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group. The groups, each with an office in Amherst, depend on canvassers to raise public awareness and money for environmental causes — one person at a time.

"Our goal is to contact every house in the area," said Greenpeace Canvass Director Bill Richardson. "We try to canvass [the entire neighborhood]."

> "Once you become aware of an injustice, you can either decide to take action or stand by and do nothing. But you can never again turn away in ignorance."
> –Greenpeace Canvass Director Bill Richardson

According to MassPIRG Canvass Director Stephanie Hanson, canvassing involves three main components: education, membership recruitment and fundraising. Membership recruitment is the key to obtaining political clout, she said. "Without community support we couldn't go to the legislators," Hanson said.

Leaders of the environmental groups said they agree local residents have been responsive to their canvassing efforts.

"The Happy Valley is probably the most receptive place possible," Hanson said.

Clean Water Action Program Director Chris Bathurst said 70 percent of the people canvassed are "willing to talk," and 50 percent will "give some level of a donation."

A 70 percent approval rating, however, also means that 30 percent disapprove. Richardson, who canvasses twice a week for Greenpeace, said he does not take personally a door slammed in his face.

"I don't internalize it," he said. "Finding the people who are supportive makes it all worthwhile. Even with people who don't support us, I've at least planted a seed as to what Greenpeace is doing."

"Hopefully, that seed will grow and eventually that person will become more aware of what we are doing," Richardson said.

Although the groups' goals inevitably overlap — all three currently have pro-recycling and anti-incinerator campaigns — Clean Water Action, Greenpeace Action, and MassPIRG are not clones. What separates these groups are the issues they adopt and their style of approach.

Environmentally sound groceries

Clean Water Action, inspired by consumer advocate Ralph Nader, helped pass the Clean Water Act in 1972 and the Safe Drinking Water Act in 1974. Since then, this grass roots organization has shifted to vegetable roots by concentrating on reducing the use of pesticides on supermarket produce.

CWA's latest effort, the "Environmental Shoppers Campaign," urges consumers and supermarkets to work together to eliminate non-recyclable packaging and pesticide-laced food.

"We want to get a marketing challenge going between the supermarkets to give the consumers what they want," Bathurst said. "A lot of consumers are interested in buying items which can be recycled."

An "Environmental Shoppers" booklet explaining the campaign's platform calls for supermarkets to set an example for others by stopping "the proliferation of excessive, non-recycled packaging," and by promoting "environmentally friendly" products, such as organically grown produce.

Other recommendations include providing an environmental education section in the store, donating edible food that has passed the expiration date to charity, and using glass and paper packaging instead of plastic and styrofoam.

The platform states, "It is senseless to use a material that is designed to last forever for short term usages such as coffee cups or deli items."

Through canvassing, CWA is getting people to sign "pledge cards" promising only to shop at supermarkets that support recycling efforts. Bathurst said these cards will be presented to supermarkets' management as a tangible bargaining chip.

Whales and Civil Disobedience

Greenpeace, an international movement best known for its "Save the Whales" campaign, started in 1971 as a nuclear disarmament group. Greenpeace has expanded its focus to include such issues as offshore oil drilling, acid rain, hazardous waste and global warming.

"All our work ties in together," Richardson said. "Our work with wildlife, toxics, and nuclear disarmament is all involved in an overall goal of preserving our planet."

While most of Greenpeace's time and resources are spent on educational programs such as canvassing, the group attracts most of its media coverage for its members' acts of civil disobedience. A recent example of what Greenpeace calls "exercises in nonviolent direct action" occurred last June at the RESCO incinerator in Saugus, Massachusetts, Richardson said.

Greenpeace demonstrators blockaded the incinerator to cultivate public awareness about the hazards of burning trash, Richardson said. Two protestors scaled a smokestack and hung a Greenpeace banner. Richardson, who drove the truck which blocked the incinerator's entrance and exit, said some demonstrators are trained at Greenpeace's "Action Camp" for civil disobedience. Participants in this camp are chosen from the most dedicated canvassers, he said.

> "You can't both burn and recycle a piece of trash."
> –MassPIRG Canvass Director Stephanie Hanson

Greenpeace is loosely based on the Quaker doctrine of "bearing witness," Richardson said.

"Once you become aware of an injustice, you can either decide to take action or stand by and do nothing. But you can never again turn away in ignorance," he said.

Trash and toxic ash

MassPIRG has sister organizations in 23 states. Inspired by Ralph Nader in the early 70s, PIRG was created by college students who wanted to have an impact on state government.

MassPIRG's current focus is the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection's "Solid Waste Master Plan," which will decide Massachusetts' trash policy for the next 10 years, Hanson said.

The group is lobbying the DEP to establish a permanent moratorium on the building of new incinerators and a plan to recycle 65 percent of all trash.

"There is no point in building more costly incinerators which cause a lot of pollution," Hanson said.

According to Hanson, burning trash releases about 5,000 chemical compounds into the air. She said 25 percent of burned waste is left over as a toxic ash which could seep into the water tables. DEP estimates warn that 85 percent of all Massachusetts landfills will close by 1995, leaving the public with two options: incinerators or recycling, Hanson added.

Because the DEP gets just as much pressure from incinerator lobbies as they do from MassPIRG, they refuse to take a firm stance on an incinerator ban, she said. Getting a commitment from the DEP to outlaw new incinerators is crucial, Hanson said, because "every incinerator we build will hurt any recycling efforts going on in the state."

"You can't both burn and recycle a piece of trash," she said.

Since recycling plants and incinerators are both privately owned and equally profitable, said Hanson, the choice comes down to which one the government wants to support.

The Canvassers

"Every single night is like a soap opera," said Clean Water Action's Shira Goldman. "There are a million stories and then you forget them all."

For canvassers like Goldman, each night out in the field is a refreshing exercise: new neighborhoods, new people, new situations.

Each canvasser has her or his own turf, a 30 to 40 home neighborhood they sweep through in four hours, usually between 5 p.m. and 9 p.m. The neighborhoods have been previously charted on color-coded maps, containing information on households' membership status.

Staci Adams, a 20 year-old Greenpeace canvasser from San Diego, said each door she knocks on has its own separate reality.

She said she encounters some rude people in her travels, but they are balanced out with people who are overly receptive.

"People have offered me tea, ice cream, and pie," Adams said. "Some canvassers have been offered to stay for dinner. I once asked someone, 'How's it going?' and he said, 'Everything was fine until you showed up.'"

"You'll get the extremes, but most people are in-between," she said.

Greenpeace's Jean Chatoff, 40, said canvassing "restored [her] faith in humanity."

"I was very cynical before I started," she said. "I thought nobody cared. Lots of people care!

"Lots of people are informed. The only people who don't know what is going on are the politicians," she said.

"Politicians may be elected by the people, but they do not always do for the people," said MassPIRG's Michelle Palazzo.

"So many people know there is pollution but not to what extent or what to do about it," she said.

"If each person in this state does their part, we can become more of a democracy," said Pallazo.

> "Every single night is like a soap opera. There are a million stories and then you forget them all."
> –Clean Water Action Canvasser Shira Goldman

Pallazo, 20, is a University of Massachusetts environmental science major who is taking a year off because of the state budget cuts in education. She said her MassPIRG education has been a worthwhile replacement.

She said the town of Pittsfield, Mass. sticks out in her mind the most. Pittsfield's water reservior was recently plagued with "giradia," a disease which most severely affects small children, the elderly, and pregnant women, she said.

While canvassing this year, Palazzo met a pregnant woman who suffered a miscarriage because of giradia.

An outbreak of the disease in Pittsfield was nicknamed "beaver fever," because it was traced to beavers defecating in the water supply. Although technically the beavers were the guilty party, the town was still at fault, Pallazo said, because the water was never tested for safe drinking.

Palazzo said this woman decided to become involved in MassPIRG so she could help prevent another Pittsfield case.

"Even if you have ten people who disagree with you, if you have one woman like the one I talked to, it makes it all worthwhile," she said.

Not a competition

Although Clean Water Action, Greenpeace, and MassPIRG all recruit from the same pool of activists, the relationship between the groups is cordial.

Hanson said the three groups coordinate their canvassing schedules so they do not compete with each other in the same neighborhoods at the same time. Before the Super Bowl, she added, MassPIRG planned a touch football game with Greenpeace.

"Ultimately, we're all working for the same goal," Hanson said.

Rush begins for UMass fraternities

By DAN BERTHIAUME
Collegian Correspondent

Increasing chapter membership is the basic purpose of fraternity rush, which began yesterday, said Josh Yedvab, president of Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity. Prospecitve pledges can get a feel for the different houses and what they have to offer, Yedvab said. Rushees are encouraged to rush all the different fraternities so they can make a fully informed decision on which fraternity is best for them, he said.

Rush attendees who speak to the brothers and show an enthusiasm to join the fraternity are most likely to be extended a bid, or invitation to join, once rush ends, Yedvab said. All rush events are non-alcoholic and must be cleared with the Rush Chairman, he said. Events must be in good taste, and typically included such things a dinners, pizza parties, movie nights, bowling, and playing pool. All are free of charge, and free transportation is provided when necessary.

There are unwritten rules as well, Yedvab said. "A fraternity will never badmouth another fraternity at a rush event. I may explain why my fraternity is better in certain ways, but I will never put another fraternity down. In fact, I encourage people to go to all the different fraternity rush events so they can find the one best for them."

Yedvab stressed the strong philanthropic aspect of fraternities.

"Fraternities are not just social clubs," Yedvab said. For example, the entire Greek Area was involved in building a playground in Holyoke last year.

"All fraternities have a national charities they do work for. People who show an interest of doing work for charity, and not just the social aspect, have a better chance of being given a bid," Yedvab said.

There is no one set type of individual that a fraternity looks for, Yedvab said. "Chapters look for a diversity of individuals who all share an interest in the fraternity," Yedvab said.

By BRIAN PURCELL
Collegian Staff

Acting as the "eyes and ears" for the University of Massachusetts police is the responsibility of the student security branch of the Division of Public Safety, said Carol Radzik, associate director of public safety.

Established in 1980, student security employs about 800 students annually, she said. In addition to walking escorts, student security includes desk receptionists who monitor the residence halls at night, she said.

Wearing blue jackets, caps and toting police radios, employees of the Student Escort Service provide walking escorts for other students to the residential areas and the Greek area, Radzik said.

Student security, is one of three branches of the division of public safety, which includes the University police as well as public safety officers, who patrol the academic areas, Radzik said. Each division works cooperatively to fight crime at UMass, she added.

"UMass is like a magnet for crime, Radzik said. "People say 'hey, let's go up to UMass and party,' and they know that students can be loose about letting people into their rooms," she said.

Radzik warned students against letting strangers into the residence halls because it could result in vandalism and theft.

"The stranger you let in could be the person who rips off your room," she said.

Although the residence halls are monitored by desk receptionists each night, students need to help, Radzik said.

"Students could really help us out by not propping doors," she said.

The Student Escort Service, which received much-needed funds last semester to restore its walking escorts this spring, has cut the wait for an escort to 7 minutes from an average of 45 minutes last fall.

"With the student component restored we're able to handle every call that comes in," Radzik said.

Escorts are available from dusk until 3 a.m., by calling 545-2123. Students can also pre-arrange an escort by calling ahead, she said.

"People have to use common sense. In any city you wouldn't go for a walk alone at three in the morning. Use the escort service and use well lit pathways," she said.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Die a feminine death

Men who have any testosterone left in them smoke a man's cigarette — Marlboros, Winstons, anything hawked by a guy in a cowboy hat.

Women, on the other hand, have been blessed by the tobacco industry with freedom of choice. Brands like "Eve" and "Capri" feature floral prints and pastel colors. Soft pink streaks line the packaging, reminding women smokers what color their lungs used to be.

Darren Garnick

Regular cigarettes are not feminine enough. To make them more female, the tobacco companies put their cigarettes on diets. Skinny, pretty designer cigarettes for women who prefer a more feminine death.

Cigarette brands aimed towards women are named "thins," "slims," or "lights." As Boston Globe columnist Ellen Goodman recently observed, they may as well be marketed as "anorexics."

"Superslims," the "first low-smoke cigarette for women," even offers non-obese smoke. "FAT SMOKE IS HISTORY," some of its ads declare.

According to Sandy King of the American Lung Association of Western Massachusetts, lung cancer has now surpassed breast cancer as the number one killer of women. Smoking accounts for 90 percent of lung cancer deaths, she said.

A.L.A. statistics state that women are now four times more likely to die from lung cancer than they were in 1964.

"Very seldom are older people in the ads," noted King.

"It is always young girls looking healthy and happy."

Ads have two aims, she said. One is to maintain the people who already smoke, and the other is to "recruit young people to fill the ranks of those who quit or die."

King, a registered respiratory therapist, said the number one reason why young women smokers find it difficult to quit is that they are afraid of gaining weight. Nicotine, the addictive substance in tobacco, speeds up the body's metabolism.

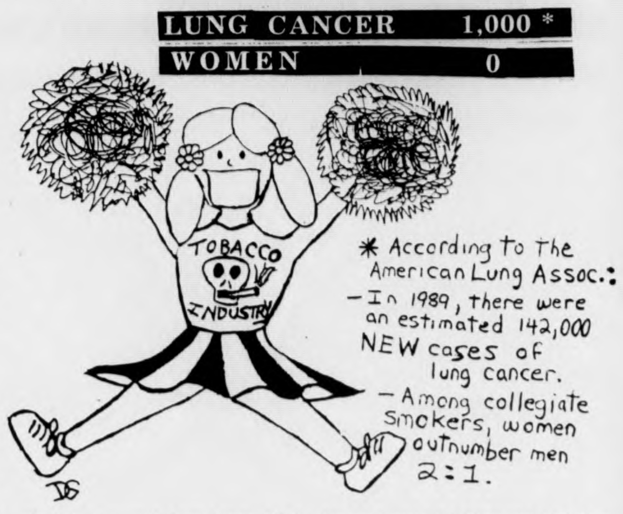
"A lot of young girls are using cigarettes as a means of weight control," King said.

In a telephone interview last week, I asked Andrew White, a spokesperson for Phillip Morris U.S.A., if Superslims were a "women's cigarette."

"Superslims are not marketed specifically towards women," he said. "Women do like the idea of a slim cigarette, but we do not discourage men from buying them."

In these Superslims ads, featuring a superslim model in a superslim dress, White said there was no effort to link cigarettes to weight control.

"The slim refers to the cigarette itself," White said. "The fact is, the Superslim cigarette is the slimmest cigarette on the market and the ads try to reflect that."



LUNG CANCER 1,000 *
WOMEN 0
TOBACCO INDUSTRY
* According to the American Lung Assoc.: – In 1989, there were an estimated 142,000 NEW cases of lung cancer.
– Among collegiate smokers, women outnumber men 2:1.
DS

Marketing research, he said, showed that consumers wanted a "more socially graceful cigarette."

The R.J. Reynolds Co., according to King, is coming out with their own "socially graceful" cigarette. Called "Chelsea," it is wrapped in chemically treated paper which gives off a perfumed scent.

"There may be a nicer fragrance when [women] smoke it," King said, "but they will still be killing themselves."

Smoking is sexy. Charcoal lungs are now in vogue. So a few measly women die from using tobacco. At least they will not die fat. If it is any consolation, coffins are now available in a variety of pastel colors.

From fiscal crisis to cure

This is part one of a two-part series.

Massachusetts residents are confused and angry. Their state is in fiscal chaos, but far too many "solutions" to the budget problem are based simply on myths and misconceptions about what's wrong with government.

Stan Rosenberg

Fact and reality have fallen victim to false perceptions in the debate over the state's budget crisis. It's time for facts, and just the facts — simple, documented facts.

Between 1982 and 1988, Massachusetts' state budget grew by 66 percent. It did not grow any faster or any larger than governments in most other states in the Northeast — not in terms of state workers and not in terms of actual dollars spent. In fact, it grew more slowly.

The 66 percent growth in state government spending here is less than the increase in almost every other state in the Northeast, including New York (up 67 percent), Connecticut (68 percent), New Jersey (80 percent), Vermont (85 percent), Maine (91 percent), and even "fiscally conservative" New Hampshire (82 percent). In keeping spending down, we were second only to Rhode Island (53 percent). The national average for increases in state spending was 51.6 percent.

In the last seven years, even while state spending increased, taxes were cut by $700 million. Where else in the United States did citizens see their taxes cut five times during the same period?

The single item in the budget which grew the most in the last six years is local aid — money sent directly back to cities and towns for schools, fire and police, and public works.

Local aid grew by $1.6 billion, twice as fast as any other item, almost doubling in size. It accounts for one-third of the entire state budget. This alone has made it possible for communities to survive Proposition two and a half.

The next largest chunk of the budget — more than a fifth of all state spending — goes to Medicaid, which is primarily health care for senior citizens. Debt payments, against money the state has borrowed in order to repair roads and bridges, build new schools and protect the environment, grew by 48 percent. Inflation alone accounted for a 24 percent increase in the state's costs.

Three items alone — local aid, Medicaid, and debt payments — eat up 61 percent of the state budget. They accounted for 48 percent of all growth in the state budget in the last six years. And the money spent in these areas doesn't pay for a single state employee.

The state payroll has also come under attack. Among the New England states, Massachusetts — the largest state — has the second lowest number of state employees per thousand citizens. According to U.S. Census Bureau figures, Massachusetts even has fewer state employees per thousand citizens than some of the poorest states in the nation, like Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi.

Nevertheless, the state is obviously spending more today than it has. Tax revenues have dropped off dramatically. Massachusetts has an $800 million deficit and the worst financial reputation in the country. The Legislature has three choices — cutting spending, raising taxes, or doing both.

Where we can cut, we have. State government spending has been slashed by 10 percent — roughly $1.2 billion — in the last year and a half. In addition, virtually all programs were forced to absorb the cost of inflation. The Legislature is now considering a savings package containing another $300 million in cuts.

We've eliminated 3,000 state jobs. Thousands of dedicated workers are being smeared with a broad and insulting brush simply because they are public employees. Hacking away at the state payroll won't solve the budget deficit.

As absurd as it sounds, 20,000 educators, police officers, human services workers and prison guards would only cut $500 million. The state would still have a $500 million budget deficit.

Government has never been popular. But never has government been less popular than it is today in Massachusetts. All credibility has been lost, yet clearly all that state government does is not bad.

It's time to move beyond false charges about what's wrong and begin a credible defense of what's right. We must restore honesty to the debate and truth to our actions, working just as hard to protect state spending where it is necessary, as to cut state spending where is wasteful.

Representative Stan Rosenberg of Amherst is a member of the Legislature's Joint Committee on Education and serves as chairman of the Higher Education Subcommittee

Unanswerable questions

We have all heard about the Stuart murder, "The Boston Hoax" that turned from a disgusting depiction of urban violence to an eerily worse psychopathic spousal murder and suicide.

Julie Kotsifas

Charles Stuart sparked high tensions in the metropolis of Boston. Black men across Boston were all suspect, raped and stripped of dignity and respect in a manhunt organized to stifle public furor over such an atrocity. We were looking for someone to blame, and the faceless Black man was put in his place. William Bennett, the one finally fingered by Charles Stuart's own hand, was Boston's doll.

William Bennett was a victim.

He was a victim of media uproar, of newspapers and TV stations gone wild at the sight of a terrible, sickening and gory story. The publicity surrounding the story incited the public to demand that the culprit be found and punished.

Many criticize both the police department's and the media's treatment of the murder as racially biased, saying that several articles or features identified and charged possible suspects unjustly and pointed an all-accusing finger at the Black man.

Was the media biased? Maybe.

I am from the same upper middle class white suburbia ideal as Charles and Carol Stuart. I joined along with the rest of America in crying, "Crucify him!"

Charles Stuart told us his attacker was a Black man. Were we then supposed to look for anyone else other than a Black man? Were we supposed to call Stuart a liar? The area of the attack, Mission Hill, is a predominantly Black, lower-class, crime-plagued area. Were we stupid, then, in believing this wounded, widowed man's testimony?

Chuck Stuart. The Friendly Furrier who duped the nation. The worse half of the Camelot couple. Did he grin evilly as he shot his wife and himself in the stomach? Did he laugh mercilessly from his hospital bed as he read the accounts in the newspapers that portrayed him as a hero? Did he chuckle as the best man at his wedding recited his tearfully loving tribute to his wife at her grave?

I don't know. I don't know why we were so quick to believe Charles Stuart, and I don't know why we're now so quick to think that he is lying and his younger brother Matthew is telling the truth.

Maybe the average American, like me, doesn't know quite what to believe and is now just a little bit distrustful of anything we now read in the paper.

I doubt that we will ever know what happened to Charles and Carol Stuart, and that's very unfortunate.

Obviously, Carol Stuart and her unborn son were the true victims in this incident. But William Bennet is also a victim along with Black men in Boston, the American public, and even the "psychopathic" Charles Stuart himself.

Convention Saturday, said they used the telephones in the SGA office.

Nakajima, who was elected as delegate said, "When I did make the phone calls to students on campus, I did so as Eric Nakajima, student, not as student trustee." He said the calls were made to further student input and representation by stimulating caucus participation.

Smith, who was not elected delegate, said he used the phones one night to contact students who were registered Democrats. He said it was to his understanding that there was not a problem with making phone calls after business hours.

Chambers, who ran and was not elected as an alternate on the Murphy slate, said he used the SGA telephones "a few nights" to call students registered to vote in Amherst before the Saturday caucus.

Crawford, who was elected as a delegate from the uncommitted slate, said he did not use the telephones in the SGA office.

Section C of the Code of Student Conduct of the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities Handbook says, "The following shall constitute violations of the CSC concerning property, which term shall include University or Commonwealth owned or leased property equipment, programs or materials ... Unauthorized possession, use, removal of, defacing, or tampering with property, or damage to or destruction of such property."

Section D of Miscellaneous Regulations says, "Students' living facilities and other University property may not be used for a business office, soliciting headquarters, etc."

Anastas would not comment on the SGA policy concerning this matter, which is still under investigation.

Music Box brings the Holocaust to court

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Staff

Ever since Costa-Gavaras explored the brooding corruption in his homeland of Greece in the 1970 film Z, he has channeled his greatest efforts and passions into films that reflect his outrage at inhumanity. After dealing with the overthrow of the Chilean government in Missing and white supremacist groups in Betrayed, it seemed only a matter of time before he explored the Nazi war atrocities in his latest film, Music Box.

Jessica Lange plays a gifted criminal attorney who must defend her immigrant father against accusations that he committed wartime atrocities 50 years ago. The court proceedings could cost him his citizenship and subjugate him to criminal prosecution back in his native Hungary.

Gavaras has taken an otherwise standard courtroom drama and has created an intense character study and portrait of self-examination. Initially convinced the charges brought against her father are false, the result of a clerical error or intentional malice, Lange is gradually forced to question herself upon hearing the testimony of Holocaust victims.

As one victim recounts the event of seeing a little boy shot in the head as he wept over the body of his mother, Lange is shaken. Her struggle is hinged on the duality of her role as lawyer and mother. As a lawyer, she forces herself to pursue the pained testimony of the witnesses, hoping to discredit the prosecution. As a mother, she is horrified at the various atrocities inflicted upon innocent women and children, and is emotionally torn as unfolding evidence suggests her father is not the man she thought he was.

Lange is very good here, capturing the hopelessness and emotional claustrophobia of a woman struggling with her own self-identity. The trial proves to be not only a test of her legal skills but of her inner-strength, as she must overcome the overwhelming evidence which is slowly destroying her love for her father.

Reknowned German stage actor Armin Mueller-Stahl plays Lange's father with a kind of Old Country pride and morality that challenges us to question his character. It's a quietly effective performance that almost goes unnoticed.

If for anything, Music Box is destined to be remembered for the haunting images it evokes. When the witnesses take the stand to testify, Gavaras exploits the human faculty of memory to terrorize us. The world will never forget the atrocities of Nazi Germany and Gavaras is fully aware of this; we don't need flashback accounts or black-and-white stills to recount the atrocities heard on the witness stand. Instead, Gavaras plays upon the power of the human mind to conjure up its own images of what occurred and the result is chilling.

Unfortunately, the film's imagery and performances are tainted by several dangling ends in Joe Eszterhas' script. Eszterhas introduces several plot twists and characters that offer added insight into the story, but he never follows up on them, running the film into a quagmire of unanswered questions. The result is an intriguing film that never quite meets the demands of its compelling subject matter.

D.R.I. time at Katina's

Thrashers of all ages can enjoy the raucous, ear-spliting sounds of D.R.I. and Nasty Savage tonight at Katina's. D.R.I. will headline. Doors open at 5 p.m. and Nasty Savage is set to go on at 5:30 p.m. Tickets are $6.

D.R.I. (Dirty Rotten Imbeciles) started in the early '80s. They opted for a hardcore sound at first, but in the past couple of years they have blended the choas of hardcore with the chunky power-crunch of thrash, thereby creating a unique sound of their own. This stop at Katina's is a part of their East Coast tour in support of their latest album, Thrash Zone.

Flocking to sludge rock like Flies to . . . rock

By MARK STURM
Collegian Staff

Halo of Flies — Well, here's an update. The first of the three most recent releases from this band was a 7" called Death of a Fly. The three new songs are all excellent, with "There Ain't no Hell" wrapping up the b-side in the traditionally pleasing Halo manner.

REVIEW

Due to the fact that this 7" is a limited edition was released over the summer, you probably will not be able to purchase this record, so I suggest a successful but extremely brief career as a suicide committer as an alternative.

Still breathing? Still reading?

Then go to your local store and attempt to purchase the Silt Breeze release of live Halo of Flies. It showcases a new song on the b-side entitled, "Ballad of Extreme Hate," and was released in full limited edition elitist glory.

Silt Breeze is a Minneapolis fanzine which focuses primarily on slime-coated sludge rock.

The most recent release from Halo of Flies is entitled Singles Going Nowhere. It features 10 songs that were previously released on extremely limited edition 7" records.

In the U.S., this record is being sold only as an import, but if you don't want to pay that much, you can simply fly to Germany and pick it up as a domestic release on the label Glitterhouse.

The cover of this record looks almost exactly like a Buzzcocks LP, and includes two covers — "How Does it Feel," a Creation song, and "Drunk in Detroit," an MC5 tune. At 10 bucks, this record is a steal.

Many copies still remain of both the "Killdozer Featuring Tom Hazelmeyer" 7", and the newest "Dope, Guns, and F—king in the Streets" 7" compilation, featuring Lubricated Goat, Boss Hog, Thee Mighty Caesars, and Vertigo.

For information on anything in this article so far, send a letter to Amphetamine Reptile Records, 2541 Nicollet Ave. South Minneapolis, MN. 55404.

Another label which represents aspects of this "scene" is Treehouse Records, and although it is nearly impossible to obtain a copy of the beautiful debut 7" from Unsane N.Y.C., you may still be able to get the Bastards LP, Monticello. Most assuredly worth your hard earned $7.

Write Treehouse Records, P.O. Box 80037, Minneapolis, MN. 55408.

Watch for an upcoming EP from the Godbullies, and an upcoming domestic LP from Cop Shoot Cop.

Do'ah brings the world to Amherst

By KAREN PLACZEK
Collegian Correspondent

Do'ah
Amherst College
Sunday, Feb. 4

Neither sleet nor snow could deter the enthusiastic turnout for Do'ah's weekend performance, kicking off this semester's Sundays at Eight program at Amherst College.

If the high cost, low budget woes of spring break have left you with nothing more than a pile of vacation brochures and a 10-day stay in your hometown, consider instead journeying around the globe with New World music group Do'ah's latest album World Dance.

For Do'ah, the concept of "New World" is more than an ideal of global peace and unity; it's a physical aspect of their music as well. The traditional drums, acoustic guitars and keyboard were overshadowed both in sight and sound by a cultural exposition of musical ingenuity. Even with the stage extended to accommodate the vast array of instruments, (some that looked more like primitive tribal gods than sound emitting pieces) it was questionable where this four-man band would find room to stand.

When Do'ah combined the resonance of a balafon from West Africa, with a Japanese biwa, a North Indian tabla and a Hawaiian mandolin (made in Brooklyn), they created more than an original vibrant sound, they wielded a material representation of world harmony.

An Arabic-Persian word signifying a call to prayer and meditation, Do'ah was founded in 1974, and by traditional terms consists of flautist Ken LaRoche, guitarist/percussionist Randy Armstrong, percussionist Marty Quinn, bassist Volker Narhmann and saxophonist Charlie Jennison. However, these definitions are restrictive. Throughout the performance, members constantly alternate between the multiplicity of instruments, a testimonial to the immense amount of musical talent evident on stage.

They opened the set with a festive, energetic composition characterized by a Latin undertone, reminiscent of the calypso music found in the amorous dance scene in Romancing the Stone.

In a piece entitled "Alaska," inspired by the state's beauty and simplicity, they used their non-traditional instruments to recreate the rushing of mountain streams, the caw of birds and forest breezes with amazing accuracy.

The ultimate expression of Do'ah's melodical principles founded itself in "The Awakening," featuring the word "peace" sung in 39 distinct languages.

Although at times the music of Do'ah seemed to blend together in rhythm, it was more than made up for through their uniquely crafted songs and beautifully played instruments. They successfully relayed their message of world peace through their musical experience.

THIRD WORLD AFFAIRS

Panama responded to

By ROBIN VARGHESE
Collegian Correspondent

A major difference marks the reactions of Third World students to the United States invasion of Panama from those of Americans.

In an informal poll conducted last week, Third World students generally disapproved strongly of the US invasion, seeing it in terms of international law rather than in terms of the personality of Manuel Noriega.

Guillermo Iranzo, a UMass graduate student from Puerto Rico in the anthropology department, said that he was "revolted by the clear violation of international law."

Nadine Pierre, an undergraduate Haitian student at Hampshire College, said, "The US is always invading the Third World. These people are so arrogant and racist."

Fahamita Khorshed, a UMass undergraduate from Bangladesh, also described the invasion of Panama as an act of arrogance.

Jamal Aruri, a graduate student from Palestine: "The US is out to show once again that it is the policeman of the world and to reinforce its hegemony over Latin America."

Rahul Simha, a graduate student from India, said: "The invasion of Panama by the US shows complete contempt for international law, but this is nothing new."

Iranzo believed that the true motives behind the invasion were to destabilize the Panama Canal Treaties, to ultimately pave the way for an invasions of Nicaragua and El Salvador, in the event of a Farabundo Marti Liberation Front victory over the Salvadoran government, and to send a message to the Third World.

"Every Third World country has to be prepared to militarily resist," added Iranzo.

Pierre stated that Noreiga was overthrown because he refused to submit to the United States, and she added, "We [the Third World] have to resist by any means necessary."

Aruri commented that in response to the United States: "The Third World needs a united response."

When asked of the high approval rating by US citizens of the invasion , Pierre, Khorshed, and Aruri blamed the US media.

Iranzo, by contrast, stated, "The response [of the US public] is typical of a country where White-European ethnocentrism is so strong and typical of an imperial power."

US invasion hurts chances of concord

The images blur together. Smiling Panamanians shedding tears of happiness as US Rangers prowl past devastated slums. Brave US heroes returning to the hugs of proud relatives in California. The conquistador Maxwell Thurman crisply assuring a doting press corps in that Panama City was "secured." The polls showing that an overwhelming majority of US citizens supported the invasion. Noriega in chains hauled to the US like the "barbarians" paraded through the streets of ancient Rome. Pax Americana.

Alas, how fragile is illusion. Faint voices echo across the void. Panamanian Sociology Professor Robert Arosemina, a long-time Noriega opponent, and Oscar Bolioli, representing Panama's National Council of Churches, say estimates of 2,000 civilian casualties are too conservative. Former US Attorney General Ramsey Clark returns with an estimate of 8,000. Reports of Stealth bombers dropping concussion bombs and napalm in densely populated zones emerge. Panamanian student, Gilma Camargo, confirms that mass graves filled with burnt and dismembered corpses are evident near the slums of El Chorillo. The price of power.

Arosemena alleges that civilian former government employees were blindfolded, gagged and thrown out of moving trucks en-route to interrogation centers. Graphic television footage of US troops engaging in search and destroy missions during 'mopping up' campaigns is shown across the world, except in the US. Diego Rabadeneira reports in the Boston Globe that the Endara regime delivered the US a list of hundreds of political activists and labor leaders, who were promptly incarcerated in camps. Asked why these people were seized, a US embassy official laconically responds "they're bad guys of some sort, I guess." The infamous Col. Eduardo Herrera Hassan, allegedly connected to the CIA and Israeli Mossad, a man responsible for wounding 500 and jailing 1500 after attacking a peaceful demonstration in 1987, is appointed head of the new US proxy army. The price of occupation.

Operation Just Cause treats some of Noriega's closest associates in strange ways. All captured associates are jailed, except the Israeli Mike Harari, who is immediately released, and returns to Jerusalem, without a single pending charge. But Harari serves an even more just cause. He cemented the Israeli- Panamanian connection, by helping Israel to sell over 500 million dollars of weapons to Panama, and inspiring Noriega to rename the National Guard of Panama (after the US National Guard) to the Panamanian Defence Force (after the lethal Israel Defence Force).

The story gets more chilling as light penetrates the Iron Curtain of self-imposed censorship. Clearly, Manuel Noriega lived by the sword. But rumors persist of the reality of Panama's racial divide. A story circulates of Noriega rising out of Panama's black barrios, where he has the mystique of a popular caudillo (strongman), and challenging the power of the white Creole elites of Panama. Even the pockmarked face, that earns him the nickname of La Pina (the pineapple), is the product of a childhood disease prevalent in the barrios, and serves as a lasting mark of his class status. He defies the Creole elite by going over their heads to the mighty spymasters of the CIA, who introduce him to the art of laundering drug money. With a gut instinct for survival, the General searches for an insurance policy against CIA betrayal, and leaks information to Cuba and Nicaragua. This insolence enrages the Empire. Retaliation is swift and brutal, falling out of the sky on the bewildered poverty-stricken black underclass of Panama, accurately identified as the support base of the new Satan incarnate.

Today, Panama's Creole elite rules uneasily, backed by gringos with guns. One wonders how 'legitimate' a government that fears its own people and relies on foreign guns to survive is? Sworn into power in darkness on a US base, these leaders seem to fear the dark skin of the Panamanian underclass.

The astonishing servility of the news media, and the utter indifference of most US citizens (busy shopping for Christmas goodies when the assault occured) to the continuing occupation of Panama (where 17,000 of the best and bravest still patrol the streets), may surprise the newcomer from outside the bubble. It does not surprise the outsider who was present here during the magnificent military victory in Grenada, or the courageous air strikes on Tripoli's civilians. Indifference and apathy are the most intelligent ways of camouflaging tacit acceptance of the status-quo. They also permit the populace to point their fingers at the powers that be. It is uncomfortable for many here to acknowledge the sad reality that US planners resort to such policies in order to fulfill their mandate to protect the 'American way of life'.

There are many who will accuse these opinions of lacking 'objectivity'. But that is precisely the argument used by the US to discredit the resolutions at the UN and the Organization of American States condemning the invasion, that were passed with overwhelming majorities. For some Third World peoples, it was not a splendid little war. If their voice is not respected, the gulf between these people of color and the people of the US can only widen. Far too much national reconstruction is needed in these nations. The violence of Pax Americana must cease.

Mentality caused bloody invasion

Lately I haven't been feeling so patriotic, meaning I haven't been up on the country in which I was born, trapped and stranded in the US. I was born in Austin, Texas, in what was once Mexican territory. It is now owned and influenced by Uncle Sam and his cronies. Now, the borders are barbed and those whose foreparents lived, cultivated and died on this so-called US soil, are labelled illegal aliens.

The history of this country is bloody, the present situation of this country is bloody, and in the future the blood of more black, brown and yellow peoples will spill. Uncle Sam spills our blood as easily as a child spills a glass of milk. But our people are rendered apathetic towards issues, even though the blood of our brothers and sisters is being spilled at this very moment.

It is a fact that Latin American blood is worthless to a large majority of the people living here in the US. A situation where hordes of people cheer the return of the misguided and unconscious US troops that bombed and strafed innocent men, women and children in order to seize one man reflects a demented mentality.

Do you know how many Panamanians were murdered in cold blood by Uncle Bush and his cronies? While we watched US television reports of the nine US soldiers killed in the first hour of the invasion, the Associated Press reported that three to four hundred Panamanian civilians were crammed into one hospital morgue alone.

The staged images that we saw of cheering Panamanians during the final days of Noriega's stay in the Vatican embassy were of crowds of upper-class, English-speaking sellouts that did not suffer the effects of concussion bombs dropped from predatory Stealth bombers on the barrios surrounding Noriega's home. The indigenous, poor, Spanish-speaking population was blown to bits; children were blown to bits, little tiny bits, and here we sit in the US, the apathetic capital of the world. There are absolutely no justifications that can be made for this type of barbaric behavior.

Aren't you just a little bit curious about the fact that just a few short years ago Noriega was buddies of Bush, and was projected as a hero in the media. It is a fact that Noriega was trained by the CIA, and seized the leadership of Panama, with their full knowledge and blessings. The drugs that everybody talks about, were a convenient source of finance for the CIA directed Contra war in Nicaragua.

Uncle Bush got really upset when Noriega woke up and decided that he was no longer going to be used by the US against his brothers and sisters in Nicaragua. The former puppet had clipped his strings. The US promptly imposed heavy sanctions on Panama, seriously crippling its economy.

Noriega did not declare war on the US (only a fool would). What he had actually stated was that the sanctions that had been imposed on Panama by the US were tantamount to a declaration of war. The US media did a nice frame job with this one.

I guess the most frustrating aspect of this whole fiasco is that one of the first US soldiers killed in the invasion had the last name of Trujillo. A Latin American man had gone down there to shoot his fellow Latin Americans in the back! It should also be pointed out that despite such a large population of Panamanians of African descent, this same scenario was acted out by US soldiers of African descent.

In conclusion, I would like to ask just one more question: can you as a US citizen conceive having a concussion bomb dropped on your baby girl's head? Neither could Panamanian mothers and fathers until our President sent in the troops.

Tomas Garcia is a UMass student.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Others are counting on your good judgement. Avoid unnecessary expenditures and take your time when making important decisions. Your personal life is changing for the better. Charm wins you new friends.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You could emerge a winner today, thanks to your popularity and clout. Curb a tendency to unleash your volatile temper. A loved one offers good advice; follow it and your income will rise.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Contact with faraway friends or overseas associates takes on greater meaning. If you feel under the weather, take some time out to rest and relax. Postpone anything you can handle another day.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A certain amount of inconvenience may be unavoidable today; keep your cool. You may be asked to extend a helping hand. Do so if it will not jeopardize your work schedule. Promote teamwork.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Romance is "loverly." You have important decisions and plans to make. Observe all safety rules if you must drive. When roads are icy, take a cab or stay home. Call an older relative.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Economizing and straightening out any financial tangles are your top priorities. Home repairs may be needed. A cash flow problem is solved when you receive an unexpected check. Romance intensifies.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You could be involved in a fund-raising project. Speak up if you need help or advice. A wonderful donation comes from an unexpected quarter. A sick child will respond to tenderness. Be patient.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your romance will blossom. Take advantage of affection you might recieve today. Bad day for entrepenurial exploits. Oat bran should be part of your daily diet, i f only to prevent colon cancer.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Find escape from a situation that is making you uncomfortable. Postpone finalizing a business deal until more information is available. A personal relationship responds to tender nurturing.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Keep the momentum going at work. you need to meet a deadline on time to preserve your reputation. Call home if you are going to be working late; loved one will understand.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Review your financial goals. You may need to be more practical; rely on experts for advice. Romance must have time and space to grow. Plan a special treat for those closest to your heart.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You will have to live up to your own standards if you expect others to do so. A raise or promotion is near. Moving to another city could upset a teenager. Talk things over.

season, and Johnson sees tonight as a rare opportunity for his team to work on various aspects of their performance in a competitive situation.

"This meet will be a good chance to try out some routines we might not try otherwise," Johnson said. "We'll see what some other guys can do — I want to try Bart Balocki and (freshman) Rob Thomas on pommel horse."

Although improvements are needed, it's still early in the season. "Our goals haven't changed — we still want to make the Eastern Regional finals," Johnson said.

ENGINEERING STUDENTS

AT RILEY, EDUCATION IS ENERGY

WHO WE ARE: Our innovative steam generator and fuel burning power systems create energy from a variety of traditional and non-traditional fuels—from gas, oil and coal, to coffee grinds, nut hulls and municipal waste. Cities and industries are learning a lot from us—and so can you.

HOW IT WORKS: Riley is seeking Chemical, Mechanical, Civil, and Electrical Engineering Students who are interested in Design Engineering, Performance Engineering, or Development work in the Steam Generation/Energy Industry. Our EIT Program is a six-to-nine-month training period in which the EIT gains exposure to the various facets of our Corporation—from contract design to field/performance testing to marketing and sales, our EIT's gain a bird's eye view.

And now, the energy is building—Riley Consolidated will be on campus:

February 7, 1990
8:30am-4:30pm
University Career Center

RILEY CONSOLIDATED INC

WHAT'S IN IT FOR YOU: Creating enough energy to meet the world's needs is one of the major responsibilities we face today. Here, you'll have the satisfaction of knowing your degree can make a difference. Plus, you'll enjoy real advancement potential, an excellent salary and exceptional benefits, including 401(k) and tuition reimbursement.

WHAT TO DO: Make plans now to stop by your Career Center and sign up for an interview! If you can't make it, send a letter and resume to: Employee Relations Department, Riley Corporation, P.O. Box 2040, Worcester, MA 01613-2040.

Despite an abundance of snow, fog and freezing rain, the University of Massachusetts ski teams fared well at the Dartmouth Ski Way in Lyme, N.H. this past weekend.

On Saturday, the combination of warm weather and fresh snow made the tough slalom course seem like a bobsled run. However, the men's and women's teams both performed well.

The women finished a close third behind Plymouth State and Boston College. Mary Sinton, right on the heels of BC's Pam Mercer, finished a strong second. Captain Marti Gilbert (10th) and freshman Debbie Adams (13th) were the other point scorers for UMass.

The UMass men were a shoo-in for a second place berth until a couple of underdog performances from Amherst College set them back to third. Senior John Roche claimed a fourth-place spot depsite skiing with a broken thumb. He was supported by Mike Hannigan (15th), Rob Umstead (21st) and freshman Matt Griffin (27th).

Eight inches of snow mixed in with some freezing rain made for extremely adverse conditions for Sunday's slalom race. This, however, did nothing to deter repeat performances from the day before. Both the men and women were again third in the second slalom of the weekend. Sinton, in strong contention for the slalom title, skied her way into fourth. Other top UMass finishers were Gilbert, Adams and Jen Egan.

Although the top four Minutemen were sidelined because of falls, the back-to-the-packers did an excellent job of filling their shoes. Transfer student Pete Sulkovitz led the team with a 12th place finish. He was followed by Griffin (16th), Mike Belanger (20th) and Umstead (21st).

UMass will travel to Loon Mountain, N.H. this weekend for the Brown University Tournament.

Men's gymnastics entertains Dartmouth tonight

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will try to get untracked tonight against Dartmouth College at the Boyden Gymnastics Center.

With the memory of Saturday's disappointing third-place finish behind Kent State and Cortland still fresh, the last two days have been spent making various adjustments.

After Saturday's meet, which dropped the Minutemen to 2-3, Coach Roy Johnson called a team meeting.

"I think it's important that an athlete understands what he's doing," Johnson said. "It's a step in the right direction when you can hear from the athlete what they need to do to improve."

"The general consensus was that we need to do more routines in practice," senior Carl Russ said. "The more you work out during the season, the more endurance you build up and your routines also come more naturally."

Although practice time spent perfecting routines can help to eliminate inconsistent performances, there are other ways to prepare for competition according to senior co-captain Bart Balocki.

"You have to prepare for the psychological aspects of competition, such as the crowd and the other team," Balocki said. "That will come when our freshmen get more used to competing collegiately."

"We've been able to make a few changes in the past two days," Johnson said. "(Junior) Mitch Hall has gotten closer on his high bar routine and we've also changed his pommel horse — the pommel horse is something we've worked a lot as a team."

going to put together a Division I basketball program, it costs money," he said. "We don't have much decision-making room to make. It was a choice the University was making."

But there were several factors that went into the decision to cut the particular sports that were affected, according to McInerney.

"Women's lacrosse was going to require a healthy infusion of resources to bring it back to the Division I level," he said. "We didn't end women's lacrosse, we suspended it. When the money is available, we will put it back on-line. But at this time, we don't have the resources to put it back on-line."

UMass won the national championship in women's lacrosse in 1982, but there has been a drop-off in the level of competition in the region since that time.

"In the past four years, [Boston University] and Northeastern have both dropped [lacrosse]," McInerney said. "Three New England land grant universities — Connecticut, Maine and Rhode Island, don't even have lacrosse."

Another factor was that very few high schools in the state play lacrosse, and that the majority of lacrosse on the high school level is played in private schools.

"The hard thing with women's lacrosse is that it has become property of the [Ivy League schools]," Bischoff said.

McInerney agreed. "It would be difficult to bring private school players into a public university," he said.

McInerney said the announcement was made early to allow athletes to transfer to another lacrosse-playing school if they wished.

It's only fair to the athletes," he said. "If a women's lacrosse player wants to transfer, they can do so."

As far as tennis, one of the biggest problems was the lack of a satisfactory place to play. Cracks in the playing surface have made the Upper Boyden Courts an undesirable facility for varsity play, McInerney said.

The Physical Plant had earlier proposed a five-year plan to refurbish several athletic facilities, including the Upper Boyden Courts, according to McInerney.

"Six months ago [the Physical Plant] called and said the five-year plan was flushed," McInerney said. "Which means, no refurbished courts. If you ever go out and look at the courts, by reputation they are the worst in Division I, and they are only going to get worse."

The rationale behind cutting the spring tennis schedule, as opposed to the fall, was that the spring schedule is traditionally more involved and has greater travel expenses. As it stands, the athletic department has already eliminated the Atlantic 10 Conference tournament, held in Morgantown, W.Va. from this spring's schedule.

Water polo will continue to play a full schedule, despite a lack of funds.

"[Coach Russ Yarworth] asked if we could keep it a varsity sport, and we had no quarrel with that," McInerney said. "It's not a sport that we could fund, and he accepted that."

Both Bischoff and McInerney said it is impossible to tell whether any more sports would be affected in the future.

But one sport that currently does not exist at UMass, ice hockey, could still find its way into the picture as scheduled in 1993.

With the proposed Mullins Convocation Center scheduled to be completed that year, the reinstatement of the ice hockey program, which was eliminated in 1978, is part of the grand scheme.

"We haven't done any budgeting for hockey. The first time won't be until fiscal year '92," Bischoff said. "When we get to 1992, if we have to reduce present programs, I'd be opposed to that. We're not going to rob existing programs to fund new ones.

"We clearly have to deal with it, but not for a couple of years," he said.

But Bischoff added, where a successful ice hockey program would be something that could potentially generate money for the University, it would be hard to overlook in making any decisions regarding the budget situation at that time.

"When you have a sport that can be a revenue producer, that's another factor, if hockey can pay its own way and also help out other intercollegiate athletics," he said.

Tomorrow: reaction from those affected directly by the cuts.

GEO remains unrecognized by administration

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

As the deadline slipped by yesterday for University of Massachusetts administrators to recognize the Graduate Employee Organization as a union, the two parties continued last-minute negotiations but remained tight-lipped about their progress.

Both Chancellor Duffey and Marc Kenen, GEO coordinating committee member, refused to comment yesterday on the negotiations but said they expect to release a statement today.

University administrators and GEO representatives have been involved in negotiations since January to discuss three demands issued by GEO after graduate student employees voted to unionize and become affiliated with District 65/UAW last November.

Last week, Duffey and Provost O'Brien refused to recognize GEO but reached a compromise on two other demands, which include the recission of a $400 curriculum fee and the assurance that the number of graduate student employees will not significantly decrease this semester.

The top administrators said eligible graduate students will receive help or waivers with the $400 fee and pledged to work to maintain the number of graduate student employees this semester.

GEO can only be awarded bargaining power by the Board of Regents, which oversees the state's higher education system, but GEO leaders say they are pressing for the administration's support to bolster their efforts to gain recognition.

A general meeting for GEO members is scheduled for Feb. 15 to discuss the current situation. GEO leaders have warned that a job action, possibly a strike, may result if their demand is unmet.

Kenen said the organization is encouraged by the administrators' actions but said without recognition a settlement cannot be reached.

Employee suspected in break-ins

By ANDY CANTILLON
Collegian Correspondent

The Department of Public Safety is investigating allegations that the two men charged in connection with the recent rash of break-ins at McNamara Residence Hall obtained keys to the buildings from a housing services employee, the director of housing services said yesterday.

Joseph Zannini, housing services director, said the person who is alleged to have given a master key or keys to the two men arrested this week in connection with the thefts, is still employed by the University but no longer has access to residence hall keys.

Robert W. Gonsalves and Richard S. Harrigan, both of Amherst, pleaded innocent to charges of breaking and entering, larceny and receiving stolen property this week in Northampton District Court.

The identity of the person who is alleged to have provided the key or keys to the men is not being released because University police and detectives are still collecting evidence, he said.

Arthur Hilson, director of public safety, would neither confirm nor deny Zannini's reports, saying only: "I have the utmost respect for Mr. Zannini and to me he is nothing but credible."

Police Lt. Michael Grabiec, who is leading the investigation, said police received new information yesterday on the case and are still recovering stolen goods. Because of the new leads, he said the case is not nearing closure.

Grabiec did not comment further because he said police comments could harm the ongoing investigation.

Zannini also said that housing services, along with the University police are attempting to determine if other residence halls are susceptible to break-ins.

A new lock system was installed in the residence halls last summer that was designed, in part, to prevent unauthorized personnel from gaining access to all of the residence halls.

USSR ends party domination

MOSCOW (AP) — The Communist Party that for decades swore its red tide would cover the globe bowed to a different revolution yesterday and agreed to allow alternative political parties to compete for control of the Soviet Union.

The decision amounts to an acknowledgment that new political forces have taken root and that it is no longer possible or desirable to crush them with the repressive tactics of the past, which ranged from mass murders under dictator Josef Stalin to the dissident arrests preferred by Leonard I. Brezhnev.

The decision by the party's Central Committee to give up the Communists' constitutional monopoly on power was a triumph of political maneuvering by president Mikhail S. Gorbachev. He packed the meeting of the 249-member body with more than 700 other officials, many of them progressives who took the floor to demand radical reform.

In the end, the guests also were allowed to vote on the new party platform, said Svystoslav Fyodorov, a famed eye surgeon and one of the participants. He spoke in an interview on Red Square during a break in the closed-door meeting.

"Article 6 will no longer be, there will be a multi-party system. There will be a normal democracy," Fyodorov said, referring to the article in the Soviet Constitution that guarantees the Communists a leading role.

Trustee, CAG members deny violating student codes

BY JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

In a productive but heated evening of Student Government Association business, University of Massachusetts Student Trustee Eric Nakajima refuted allegations that he and three other University students violated the Student Code of Conduct.

Accusations made public Wednesday by Student Attorney General Jonathan Anastas centered around the use of phones for partisan politics by Nakajima and Commuter Area Government members Brian Crawford, Ted Chambers and Robb Smith.

Nakajima cited Chapter 55, sections 13 and 14 of Massachusetts General Law regarding abuse of building space and equipment by elected officers and employees of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

"Jonathan [Anastas] never mentioned specifics of legalities, he just said that laws had been broken. No laws had been broken, according to our lawyer," Nakajima said. "There is a huge gap between saying people are uncomfortable with what you are doing and calling something illegal."

Anastas said Tuesday that the students were being investigated for the posssible "misuse of capital equipment for political ends."

Chambers said, "They were trying to enforce a law that only applies to state employees and officials like the governor, not students."

SGA Treasurer Laura Filkins said she had spoken to Nakajima at an earlier date regarding the use of SGA equipment for political use. "Part of what I said was based on ethics, part was based on what I thought was contained in the Student Code of Conduct," she said.

Anastas said he and his associate Keith Strier had been "advised by legal counsel not to make any statements or enter into any discussion pertaining to this matter."

In other SGA news:

- Matter of discussion quickly shifted to the unanimous approval of a motion put forth by Southwest Area Senator Angus McQuilken to dub April 22, 1990 "Earth Day." "It will be a day set aside to promote preservation of the global environment. . . and all students, faculty, administrators, staff, and members of the community are encouraged to participate," McQuilken said.
- Bob Monaghan, president of Southwest area government, proposed the creation of a Housing Investigation task force to oversee decisions made by the University Housing Office.

"[The task force] will deal with Housing and the fact that they are gaining too much power," Monaghan said. "We'll be dealing with student rights, fair treatment of students and [resident assistants], and the few occasions when [resident directors] have wrongly invaded the privacy of student rooms."

The task force was unanimously approved.

Monaghan, and SGA spokesperson Ken Parker said the Housing Office has violated University policies and the constitutional rights of students and R.A.s.

"It will assure a more broad-based protection of student rights in residential halls," Monaghan stated.

S. African conservatives reject ANC

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) — The pro-apartheid Conservative Party said today it will stage protests and strikes to drive President F. W. de Klerk from power and block his plans to share power with Blacks.

Koos van der Merwe, chief spokesman for the Conservatives, the main White opposition party, said de Klerk deceived South African Whites by suddenly legalizing the African National Congress guerilla movement and more than 60 other anti-apartheid groups.

He said de Klerk's National party would not be able to retain power in the face of a White backlash.

The Conservatives are pushing for a new election. If de Klerk rejects that proposal, the party would organize "stay-at-home" campaign or general strikes that would bring the country to a half, van der Merwe said.

"We will keep the pressure on him . . . until he has no choice but to call a general election," he said.

If large numbers of Whites joined a general strike, they could bring the government to a standstill, halt most transportation and shut down businesses, schools and hospitals.

On Friday, de Klerk lifted the ban on the ANC and other opposition groups and partially lifted the state of emergency as part of a plan to begin negotiations that would bring the disenfranchised Black majority into the government.

Dukakis proposes spending increase

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Michael S. Dukakis has asked the legislature to approve $67.5 million in additional state spending as a key House leader said there still was no firm strategy to deal with the $500 million budget deficit.

Dukakis' supplemental budget would not add to the deficit since the requests for more money come in accounts the administration has known since last July were under funded.

"When I decided it was unnecessary to cut $491 million from other budget accounts, it was in light of the knowledge that we would need to return to seek new appropriations in the under funded accounts," Dukakis said Wednesday in a message to the Legislature.

The cuts to which he was referring were made in July to the 1990 fiscal year budget.

The single largest amount requested by Dukakis was an additional $36.8 million to pay for group health insurance coverage for state employees. He said without the money, the account will run out of dollars March 31.

Health care also accounted for some of the remaining additional spending.

Money for workers' compensation benefits for state employees hurt on the job, for health care benefits for severely disabled people and for medical care for people in the General Relief welfare program also are estimated to run out by mid February.

Meanwhile, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Richard Voke, D-Chelsea, said he did not detect any significant change in the attitude of House members toward new taxes.

Voke said he would start hearings late this month on Dukakis' 1991 budget plan and expected them to continue into March.

The budget for the bookkeeping year that starts July 31 will reach the House floor in April, Voke said.

"I don't think there's been any significant change in the feelings of the House members in the last three or four weeks. Obviously they'll have to look to what happens — and what cuts can be made and how far revenues deteriorate," Voke said.

Voke said he personally agreed with the need for new taxes, both to deal with the deficit and to provide more money for next year.

"Do you want to put people out of nursing homes or out of hospitals, sick and elderly people?" Voke said.

Dukakis on Tuesday renewed his call for a tax increase, and said he would accept a temporary tax hike to pay off the $500 million deficit. He also called for permanent new taxes to provide more money for 1991 fiscal year spending.

Dukakis reiterated that without new taxes to retire the deficit, he will cut the money from state aid to cities and towns.

Dukakis' supplemental budget included requests of $8.37 million for workers compensation, $1.6 million for health care for the disabled, $12 million to provide the emergency assistance to homeless in emergency shelters, $5 million for health care for people on General Relief, and $100,000 for prisoner transportation money for counties.

The bill also seeks $2.5 million for the Community Development Finance Corp. for a contract in which the state went into default in September, and $1.069 million to pay off a court judgment in a longstanding civil rights case.

Dukakis outlined spending cuts he already has made and said he would meet the cuts targets set in a deficit reduction plan approved by the legislature in December.

Amherst to hold Select Board election tomorrow

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

Amherst's town primary tomorrow will determine whether two University of Massachusetts student candidates are pretenders or contenders in the race for two empty seats on the Amherst Select Board.

Brian Crawford and Robert Smith, who have pledged to serve as a bridge between the University and the town, are two of six candidates running for the Board.

The other candidates are: H. Olman Brooks, a management specialist for Spaulding Sports Worldwide; Richard Gold, a retired UMass psychology professor; David Keenan, a real estate developer; and Carolyn Holstein, a social psychologist.

Tomorrow's primary will narrow the field of candidates down to four for the town election to be held on March 13.

Both student candidates said they are confident that they will survive the primary.

"Clearly, I see us taking the top two seats," Crawford said. "There's clear visual student support, and the townspeople have expressed some support as well."

Smith said his candidacy has received "not one negative response yet."

"A lot of people have heard of us from the newspapers," he said. "People seem excited. I have had a few indifferent responses, but nothing hostile."

According to Smith/Crawford Campaign Manager Ted Chambers, his candidates' strength lies in a student-volunteer outreach staff. Several volunteers helped Candidate tackles issues

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

As the race for the Amherst Select Board tightens, candidate H. Olman Brooks yesterday unveiled his positions on two of the most controversial issues of the campaign.

Brooks, a management specialist for Spaulding Sports Worldwide, is one of six candidates vying for the two open seats on the Board.

Four Unrelated Person Bylaw

The definition of "family" in the Amherst zoning bylaws allows no more than four unrelated people to share a house or apartment. Students have criticized the measure as "a snob law" which is designed to keep them out of affluent neighborhoods.

Brooks said he supports the idea of a bylaw which prevents "overcrowding," but that the current law has flaws and should be revised.

"In a big farm house with 10 bedrooms, obviously 10 people should be able to live there," he said.

Brooks said he would support a revised bylaw which takes into consideration the amount of bedrooms or floor footage of a house or apartment.

Housing Review Board

The Housing Review Board was designed to mediate disputes between tenants and landlords. The Select Board has the final say on who serves on the Housing Review Board.

Brooks, the chair of the housing board, said it did a "marvelous job its first two years [in existence]."

However, he added, "it doesn't work as it should."

Brooks said some revisions of the board are needed, but the board's problems have been blown out of proportion. He said he seldom hears praise for the Housing Review Board's positive aspects.

"It has got landlords and tenants to talk to each other. That we don't hear about because it is not front page news," he said. "There are happy landlords and tenants who we never hear about."

Asked if he thought any of his opponents were running out of self-interest, Brooks said, "I think anyone who serves on any board should think of the town's interest in front of their own."

Mississippi court rules segregation still in schools

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — A federal appeals court ruled that vestiges of segregation "permeate" Mississippi's public universities 15 years after a lawsuit was filed to change the system.

The 2-1 decision by a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in New Orleans overturned a lower court ruling in a lawsuit by Blacks over policies at Mississippi's five historically White and three historically Black universities.

"The badge of inferiority that marks Black institutions has not been removed," judges Irving Goldberg and Sam D. Johnson wrote in the decision released Tuesday. "As such, there remains in Mississippi's higher educational system vestiges of discrimination which distort the perception of Black students."

Unfortunately, they wrote, "this case lingered, loitered and lulled for more than a decade" without adequate changes.

Hours after the ruling, state leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People ap-

EDITORIAL/OPINION

A lonely convenience

I never wanted a roommate. That sentiment shouldn't be surprising after going through two years at UMass in Boston without one.

I transferred. I was assigned one last semester. For a while, I cringed, pouted and whined. I thought I'd hate her. I was so sure I wouldn't survive the mutual sharing and consideration that the months ahead required. I wanted my space and my privacy in my own room. In the meantime, I also had to live with her.

A. Regina Santiago

When she showed up in September with her luggage totalling only about a tenth of mine, my face lit up. I was suddenly on a quick way to recovery from those anxiety attacks. This actually wasn't going to be as painful as I imagined. I had my small, negligible doubts as I closely examined her cornrowed hair, but that's another story for another day.

We divided the room equally to accommodate our belongings. She, too, liked to sleep to music. Furthermore, she tiptoed around me, making it needless for me to have to discuss with her the painful repercussions of interrupting me in my slumber. We agreed about everything.

She moved out this semester to be free of RAs, their pesky rules and (I assume) my whining. Her tendency to roam the halls with an open container of water (which the RA, by some deduction that only logically appealed to herself, always insisted was alcohol in disguise) proved to be just the perfect excuse to justify her leaving. She was too free-spirited to succumb to superiors and their endless list of no-no's.

As I struggle to live with her ghost everyday, there are at least three people on my floor who are fighting over another available single room down the hall.

Don't get me wrong. I understand perfectly their need to shut the door and know that nobody else has the key to barge in unannounced. I sympathize with their impatience when their stereo is mysteriously turned off as soon as they head for their morning shower. I like answering the phone knowing that it's a wrong number if it isn't for me. I agree that a whole room is better than a half. But there are other things.

It's amazing the things you get used to, even the annoying little quirks that previously drove you to turn "silent screaming" into an art form. Sometimes I expect to find her (wet) clothes occupying every nook and cranny of the room. I can still sense the stench of those magical concoctions (she liked to call them by some strange name I never could pronounce) permanently wafting through the air. I also wish for those times that we could hide in our room and talk through the night.

I come home looking forward to having somebody to listen to my endless ramblings or a shoulder to hold me up when failed relationships and dizzying responsibilities get the better of me.

I've replaced her with a TV that neither gets any channels other than PBS, engages me in conversation when I'm babbling in my sleep or takes care of me after I throw another vicious head butt to the wall whenever I can't deal with life any other sane way.

I wanted this space, this privacy and this room all to myself for what seemed then like an eternity. But now that I have them all I haven't been able to get past reminiscing to make best use of them.

I'll live without the inconvenience of living my life around two schedules, mine and hers.

I should be able to manage now that the room doesn't reek of incense anymore.

I can also turn my lights on and off as I please and blast my music without a thought as to how much I might be intruding on her psychological well-being.

But I miss her.

Unconscious oppression

I feel oppressed. I seem to be greatly outnumbered on this campus, but I am not alone. You see, I am left-handed, and it seems that everything in this world is designed for right-handed people.

Think about it. The paper that you are holding right now, the Collegian, you have to open from the RIGHT side. Or the notebook from your last lecture. Chances are that you opened it with the right hand.

Gayle Long

Another thing that burns me up about this righty domination is pencil sharpeners. When was the last time you used the left hand to put a point on your pencil? The only way out of this for me was to buy an electric pencil sharpener. And the same thing applies to manual can openers. It is absolutely annoying.

But then even more distressing is the fact that some people patronize lefties with such ridiculous ploys as the "Left-Handed Mug." My roommate has one of these, and I had to let her in on the big joke — if she turned the damn thing around then right-handed people could use it, too. Maybe I am looking for some kind of reverse discrimination, but believe me, this is not it.

This campus is no treat for lefties. With a few minor exceptions, the chairs and desktops are specifically designed for the ease of the right-handed person.

Here is a classic example: I have a lecture in which the professor wants (oddly enough) assigned seating. The 118-seat auditorium was jampacked the first day and the professor warned us to find a seat that we liked because at the next meeting he would pass around a seating chart to keep track of attendance.

I was in a dilemma. I knew that, even if I wanted to sit in the middle of the row of seats, I would end up bumping elbows with some righty who does not understand the social pressures of being left-handed.

So, I decided to do the honorable thing and take a seat at the far left of an aisle. This would save me from many dirty looks and a notebook with pen marks going across the page when the elbow bumping war begins.

Fortunately, there is a quasi-happy ending. For me, at least. Before the lecture, I met up with Jody, also in the class, and surprisingly (as we lefties seem so vastly outnumbered) discovered that she was a lefty, too. Although I felt that I had to sit separate from the rest of the class because of my lefty tendencies (you know, like water and oil not mixing), sitting with Jody was a great idea. We would have the chance to sit together wherever we wanted and have the elbow room we desired. The entire way to lecture I laughed to myself,"Ha-Ha, Professor Clayton, the joke is on you!"

But this is not the end. Even though we sat together in the middle of the row, there was one problem — the woman who sat to Jody's left was a righty. So although I was safe from harm, Jody was not.

Perhaps I should be gracious and offer to switch off every other lecture. I am meaning to ask her that. It just would not be fair to ask Jody to always be the one to get bumped around. This oppression is simply inescapable.

"UH-OH! WAIT'LL THE ANIMAL RIGHTS ACTIVISTS HEAR ABOUT THIS!"

Myths of University employment silenced

Public higher education has been put on the defensive.

It's been said — again and again — that public colleges and universities are bloated and overstaffed. At a time when state government is being scaled down, public campuses have not made their fair share of cuts. Students, faculty, and staff may hear these complaints from the public, in the press, and from legislators they speak with this year.

But the charges are wrong. It's time to take a hard look at public higher education in Massachusetts and how it compares with other states. It's time to put the facts — not more lies — on the table.

Massachusetts' public higher education system is clearly not overstaffed.

The most recent U.S. Census Bureau data shows that the national average for public higher education system employees is 57.9 per 10,000 citizens. Massachusetts has 39.5 employees per 10,000 citizens — well below the national average. And that was before the sweeping cuts made in recent months.

What's more, Massachusetts public higher education employee-to-student ratio is the fifth lowest in the United States. We're 4.5 employees below the national average for faculty and 14 employees below average for non-instructional employees. Massachusetts public colleges and universities are not top-heavy with administrators.

Here at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the employee-to-student ratio is below the average for campuses in the Northeast.

There may be some positions in the public higher education system which are unnecessary or overpaid. Where this exists, it must be eliminated. But it is wrong and irresponsible to paint the entire system and its employees with one broad and insulting brush.

Some of the confusion stems from an inaccurate picture of the public higher education work force. Data released by the Governor's office on Dec. 12 lists 20,705 higher education employees.

Stan Rosenberg

This number is deceptive. More than a quarter of those employees, 6,787, are not state funded. They are paid through grants and trust funds by the federal government and private sources. In reality, state-funded public higher education employees number 13,827.

Public higher education has made its share of cuts. According to a memo from the Secretary of Administration and Finance dated September 21,1989, 797 positions had been eliminated from the public higher education system since July 1988. More than 100 jobs were eliminated in the last four months alone.

Public higher education has been asked to cut another 700 employees, on top of the nearly 800 already eliminated.

This is grossly unfair.

State-funded public higher education staff make up 21 percent of the executive agency work force. As state government cuts its work force by 5,000 jobs, public higher education shouldn't be asked to cut more than its share — 21 percent. That's 1,050 jobs.

Yet the administration's reduction target for public higher education is 1,497. This is almost 30 percent of all positions to be eliminated.

Student fees were raised this semester at public colleges and universities to continue to fund critical faculty and staff positions.

These jobs are necessary to protect the quality of education for students already enrolled at our campuses. It would be unfair now to cut these positions, eliminate course offerings and curtail services after students have already paid additional fees designated for these expenses.

Despite the public perception and charges of a few ill-informed critics, Massachusetts public colleges and universities on the whole are not overstaffed.

Campus work forces are below both regional and national standards. Armed with these facts, the thousands of students, faculty, and staff at public colleges and universities must dismantle the misconceptions which trouble our system.

Public higher education has much of which to be proud. In ways too numerous to count, our campuses are the driving force behind social and economic progress throughout Massachusetts. It is this message which must drive the debate on the future of our public colleges and universities.

Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) is a member of the Legislature's Joint Committee of Education and serves as chairman of the Higher Education Subcommittee.

Humanity marked with monetary hang-ups

A baby is born. Pink, round-faced, wrinkly little infant. How will you grow up, little one? How much will you get to eat? Will it be nourishing? Will there be enough? Can mommy and daddy afford to keep you alive?

A child grows. What will your dreams be, little child? Will you have any? Will they be fulfilled? Will you become educated? Will you be who you want to be? Can you afford it?

A teenager grows up. What are you going to do with your life? Will you ignore the temptation to sell drugs for money? Will you steal and lie in the face of poverty? Do you live in envy and fear? Are you tired? Can you afford to grow up?

An adult lives in the streets. What did you do with your life? Why don't you get a job? What's your story? Do you live in that alley? Can you afford to stay alive?

Life is a game. Not like croquet or badminton, but like jungle warfare. Everyone wants to survive. Some play to win at any cost. Some just enjoy playing. Too many lose. Justice is not a steadfast priority in the rulebook. The most important playing piece of all is money.

I tried for most of my life to deny the significance of money. I was a fool. For so long I believed love and friendship and empathy could conquer all. A real fool I was. A real cynic I have become.

What was I thinking? The genius game makers of this world, the Milton Bradley's of societal values, have deemed money the most important thing in the universe. Then in some remote corner of the globe, some players who were probably living on bread crumbs, invented the saying, "Money can't buy you happiness." Well let me remind you what it can buy.

Josh Galitsky

Money can buy you food to keep you alive.

It can buy you an education to improve your mind and spirit.

It can buy you medical supplies to keep your body functioning.

It can buy you a warm shelter away from the pavement.

It can buy you some peace of mind, knowing that you are taking care of your own.

It can buy you dignity, value and worth in society's eyes.

It can buy you warm clothing to keep you healthy and safe.

It can buy you time to do the things you want to do.

It can buy you mobility, freedom and access.

It can buy clean air and clean water.

It can buy the little luxuries and entertainments that keep our lives interesting.

It can buy plane tickets to see the people that you love.

It can buy phone calls to keep a relationship alive.

Shall I go on?

Money is very important for what it can give us. But it has become too important in what it makes us. When Donald Trump is a hero, Leona Helmsley a scapegoat and the Rockefellers are more worthwhile as human beings than the Joneses, it becomes wrong.

Money in and of itself is not evil. It has saved lives and fed nations. It has cured diseases and helped ease disasters. It has given hope to the hopeless. But when you think about how many have died, suffered, been oppressed, been exploited and killed in the name or for the sake of money, it staggers the human mind.

When money makes us ignore each other, lie to each other, kill each other, betray each other and give up on each other, it is being used for evil and we in turn become something less than human.

My solution? I don't know. I've been a fool for so long, thinking that money wasn't that important. I don't know what to feel anymore. All I know is that humankind is on a collision course with itself. Money is a life necessity. But if we continue to live by the motto, "greed is good," those words could become the epitaph engraved on the tombstone of humanity forever.

Manager's remarks under fire

While I commend John Bonin's efforts ("Mall managers stress safety," Jan. 30) to provide escorts to employees leaving the Hampshire Mall, I cannot let his statement about Sharon Galligan's murder go unchallenged.

"She did nothing to warrant her attack," he said.

Oh? Does that mean that there are things women can do to warrant their being attacked? That "warrant" their being stabbed to death?

We are so accustomed to phraseology like Bonin's that it sounds quite normal — but the deeper implications are very scary indeed.

History keeps west afloat

Is there such a thing as Western Massachusetts? If so, where does it begin?

For the purposes of this letter, let us simply use the four westernmost counties, though many people would certainly argue with this somewhat-artificial division.

The counties are: Franklin, Hampshire, Hampden and Berkshire. They are bordered on the north by Vermont, on the west by New York, on the south by Connecticut and on the east by the Quabbin Reservoir, mostly.

This large body of water is probably the focal point of the conflict between Western Massachusetts and Boston.

By almost every standard, there is a significant difference between Western Massachusetts and the eastern regions. They are distinct with regard to their histories, politics, economics, languages and customs.

Historically, Western Massachusetts was settled very early by people who traveled up the Connecticut River, not over land from Boston or Plymouth. Northampton was incorporated in 1654, Hadley shortly after that and Springfield before both.

Western Massachusetts is conservative and Republican, with Silvio O. Conte, a long-term U.S. representative, now one of the most senior members of Congress.

Compared to a Bostonian, one can certainly tell a native of Western Massachusetts by the way he or she speaks and through the diverse customs, economics, geography, education and traditions they make us of.

And as for the towns, they buried those so that Boston could grow.

Real life includes intelligence

I am responding to Erin Martin's column "Courses Lack Real Issues"(Feb. 2). The purpose of going to college is not "to learn what it takes to make it in the real world" or "how to get a good job and raise a family" or "how to be successful."

If this is what you want to learn, drop out of college immediately, spend a few evenings with a backlog of Ann Landers' columns, read Dale Carnegie's "How to Win Friends and Influence People" and have a chat with your father, who sounds like he knows what you want to know.

This will save you four years of trouble and a considerable amount of money.

The purpose of going to college is to learn to think and understand, to learn to make informed judgments and assess new situations. These lessons are much more fundamental than a very simple "how-to."

If you become able to think independently, you can cope with any circumstance, including a job and a family. This is the only true way to become a success. The coursework at any university should be aimed at developing the mind. It should not be reduced to some get-successful scheme like those pitched on late-night television.

I understand your frustration with everyday annoyances, but even people who don't finish high school will learn to buy a car and balance their checkbook. At a university, you have the opportunity to learn much more than that.

Alumnus angered with turnout

As an alumnus and season ticket holder, I am embarrassed by the amount of students attending the men's basketball games at the Cage.

The quality of the students is great. But with the Minutemen having their first winning season in ten years, the Cage should be filled to the rafters!

Coach Calipari has the Minutemen playing an exciting brand of basketball, and the team deserves the support of the student body.

In this era of fiscal gloom, the men's hoop team has provided many positive moments.

There are 20,000 of you on campus, so get off your butts and go wait in line at the Cage!

Go UMass!

Series unites campus women

By CHRISTIN COLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's studies department yesterday began this semester's Brown Bag Lunch Series, a weekly program in which various speakers lecture and discuss women's issues with students and faculty.

Lee Edwards, women's studies program director, said the series was created in the spring semester of 1989 to bring together different groups of women from around campus to present an intimate setting.

"Women's studies students wanted to feel more in tune with the program," Edwards said.

Students from many different majors attended yesterday's introductory meeting. Most said they were there to learn more about women's issues.

Laura Denekamp, a communications and economics major with a women's studies minor said: "I have been becoming more interested in women's issues and wanted to get more involved in local women's issues as opposed to classroom theory."

Tom Dumas, an astronomy major, said it is important for men to also become aware of and educated about women's issues.

"I am amazed at the lack of men that are here today and in my women's studies class," Dumas said. "It's important that I learn what's going on because changes are going to have to start with me and my friends."

The series, which is also being offered to students for one credit, is held every Wednesday from 12:15-1:30 p.m. The room number can be found at the information desk in the Campus Center. Beverages will be provided.

"We cannot rule out the emergence of new parties," Politburo member Vitaly I. Vorotnikov said in remarks reported by the official Tass news agency. "But we Communists are not going to surrender our positions. Just as any party in the world, we shall be waging a struggle for our rights."

Vorotnikov added that the party will negotiate with any political force that stands for democracy and rejects violence. "We shall speak not only with Communists but with the whole people," he said during a briefing.

Fyodorov said that only maverick Communist Boris N. Yeltsin voted against the platform that called for abolition of Article 6, which calls the party the "leading and guiding" force in Soviet society.

Yeltsin favored a more radical program that demanded a virtual apology by the party for decades of totalitarianism.

Gorbachev has been struggling for nearly five years to transform the Soviet Union from a repressive "Third World nation with missiles," as some Westerners have termed it, to a modern democracy.

compile a target list of registered student voters used in their canvassing efforts, he said.

"We're better organized than the opposition," Chambers said. "Our candidates aren't handing out leaflets or making phone calls. We have a staff that does that for them while they go out and meet the voters."

Chambers said that by tomorrow, Smith and Crawford will have canvassed all the UMass dormitories, trying to personally reach every registered voter on campus.

In addition, the Smith and Crawford campaigns are sponsoring a voter shuttle service for students who need a ride to the polls, he said.

Smith and Crawford have repeatedly said that they are running on issues, while their opponents are campaigning on their resumes.

"We're going to turn out some voters," Smith said. "We're the best candidates. We're talking issues, we're offering answers, and I think people realize that."

Crawford added: "We're the only candidates who are offering answers. All the others are mentioning which church groups they are in, or teddy bear rallies. We discuss how to balance the town budget."

Asked for an indication that non-student voters will support his candidacy, Crawford referred to the results of Saturday's Amherst Democratic caucus, where he was one of two students who were elected as delegates for the state gubernatorial Democratic convention.

Amherst voters chose him over H. Olman Brooks, one of his opponents in the Select Board race, Crawford said.

"The other candidates are responding to us," he said. "They are responding to what we are saying because they aren't saying anything. We're carrying the agenda."

Sue Church, a volunteer for the Smith and Crawford campaigns, said electing students to public office is the only way for students to have a voice in issues affecting the University.

"It is about time students take power," she said.

pealed to students and administrators of traditionally White-dominated schools to be more accepting of Black students.

"Racism is America's Number 1 problem. This ruling about Mississippi gives a true portrait of Mississippi, but in any other state the ruling could have been the same," said state NAACP President Aaron Henry.

He said Whites had not worked as hard as Blacks in the desegregation effort that began when a court ordered the University of Mississippi to enroll James Meredith, its first Black student, in 1962.

"The willingness of the Black communities to adapt to their [White] presence is more than the Whites are willing to accommodate Blacks," Henry said.

Knitting Factory 101: Curlew at Iron Horse

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Valley Jazz

If you followed this column last semester, you may remember my rants 'n raves about the Knitting Factory club in New York City, and the vital new music scene it represents. I hope that some of you got curious and listened to a few of the Live at the Knitting Factory shows on WMUA. Now, for those of you who want to take the next step, here's some interesting news: Curlew, a mainstay band at the Knitting Factory, will be appearing at the Iron Horse in Northampton a week from tonight.

Curlew is an ideal introduction to the Knitting Factory scene, because their music is more accessible than many of their more overtly experimental Downtown colleagues, yet their sound is fairly typical of what goes on down there. Also, you might have caught them last year when they played at Hampshire College's Saga Dining Commons. Although Fred Frith's band admittedly upstaged them at Hampshire, Curlew is well worth a look.

The band has actually existed on-and-off since 1979, as the brainchild of saxophonist/songwriter George Cartwright. Its original incarnation featured bassist Bill Laswell, now widely recognized as a "hip" New York funk and world-beat producer, and keyboardist Wayne Horvitz, another Knitting Factory regular. As it exists now, Curlew is sort of a "supergroup" of avant-garde players who made their names as members of other bands such as Orthotonics, Skeleton Crew and Etron Fou Leloublan, which are known to 70s new-music obscurophiles.

When Curlew started out, their music represented one of several more-or-less independent attempts to combine jazz and rock (along with other influences) without succumbing to the cliches of 70s fusion. The prime mover in this direction was jazz pioneer Ornette Coleman, whose 1975 album Dancing in Your Head breathed new life into a tired genre. Curlew, like various other bands, picked up on Ornette's "harmelodic" concept, which included angular melodies, unusual harmonies, free-ish improvisation and herky-jerky polyrhythms. Labels like "punk-funk" and "no-wave" were attached to the music of Ornette and such sidemen of his as Ronald Shannon Jackson, James Blood Ulmer and Jamaaladeen Tacuma; artists and other bands without direct connections to Ornette — such as Curlew — received less recognition.

More recently, the idea of cliche-less jazz-rock has moved on to include what critics like to call "deconstructivism," i.e., "noise." Bands like Last Exit and the President have exchanged some of marmelodics' finesse for raw, abrasive power. Curlew represents this element via guitarist Davey Williams: he literally tortures his guitar with various objects as well as his bare hands. Cellist Tom Cora also "prepares" his instrument, though the sounds he gets are closer to Fred Frith's mannered approach than to the wild, maniacal approach of Williams.

If this sounds hopelessly intellectual, bear in mind that Curlew's music is balanced effectively by Cartwright's more direct melodicism, both as a songwriter and saxman, and by the solidity of the rhythm section (bassist Ann Rupel and drummer Pippin Barnett). In fact, you can almost dance to Curlew's music.

Those who have followed the Knitting Factory scene for the past few years will probably say that Curlew is no longer on that ever-elusive "cutting edge," since they haven't really departed from the style they codified in the early 80s. However, we're not exactly talking Top-40 here. Curlew represents a movement in American music that deserves to be heard, yet hasn't really been recognized beyond the walls of a small storefront club in New York

Some high steppin'

A step show will be performed by Phi Beta Sigma this Saturday, Feb. 10 at 11 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Stepping is hard to describe, but Scott Hill, President of Phi Beta Sigma said, "Stepping is sort of a synchronized dance, involving chanting, clapping and stomping your feet.

"Black fraternities and sororities have done it for over 30 years," Hill continued. "Stepping originated in ancient African dances, and the Black fraternaties and sororities improved it and have made it an American Black tradition."

Phi Beta Sigma competes in yearly stepping competitions all over the East Coast. They were winners of the past four competitions in Boston, and have won six out of ten held in New York City.

A velvet fog descends upon the FAC

Mel Torme/Helen Reddy
Fine Arts Center
Tuesday, Feb. 6

This is a show.

You can have your The The and any other angst-filled rock band. When it comes to sheer showmanship, nobody can do it better than the Velvet Fog, Mel Torme.

Helen Reddy opened the show. Clad in a tight black skirt and sequinned gold top, one would never have guessed the Australian sensation has been performing for 40 years. Her voice was as lucid and strong as it was back in 1971 when she reached international fame.

Reddy performed selections from her extensive well of pop hits from the 70s, including the feminist anthem "I Am Woman." The audience greeted each tune with a warm round of applause, and I was surprised at how many of her tunes I actually new.

After a brief intermission, it was time for the legendary Velvet Fog to creep onto the stage. A master showman, Mel Torme introduced each of his tunes with anecdotes, including references to Night Court, that had the crowd rolling in throes of laughter. Despite a bout with the flu, which left his voice noticeably hoarse, Mel and his players refused to hold back.

Torme delivered a wide variety of songs, his repertoire stretching from a Carousel medley to scat songs to "The Goodbye Look," written by Donald Fagan of Steely Dan.

FIRST I FIGURED I'D TRY THE DERKINS DAME. SUSIE AND I NEVER HIT IT OFF, ALTHOUGH OCCASIONALLY WE HIT EACH OTHER.
SUSIE HAD A FACE THAT SUGGESTED SOMEBODY UPSTAIRS HAD A WEIRD SENSE OF HUMOR, BUT I WASN'T GOING TO HER PLACE FOR LAUGHS. I NEEDED INFORMATION.
THE WAY I LOOKED AT IT, DERKINS ACTED AWFULLY SMUG FOR A DAME WHO HAD A HEAD FOR NUMBERS AND NOT MUCH ELSE. MAYBE SHE'S GOT SOMETHING ON JACK AND JOE. THE QUESTION IS, WILL SHE SING?
NO, I WON'T TELL YOU WHAT THE ANSWER IS! DO YOUR OWN WORK!

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Take a temporary job if you cannot find the full-time position you want. You could learn something. Joining clubs helps you make contacts. Speaking a foreign language comes in handy.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A hobby could turn into a real money-maker. Seek experts' advice. A change of lifestyle will give you greater energy. Straighten out a personnel problem as quickly as possible. Romance could prove baffling.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Indulge a love for travel and make money, too! Visit an old friend who can furnish you with the names of contacts or new business leads. Offer this person a finder's fee.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Friends will pitch in if you run out of steam. Dwelling on a disappointment or sorrowful occurance could distract you from work. Be more philosophical. Better days lie just ahead!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Something or someone could stop you from carrying out your plans. Hot words and hasty actions can spell trouble. Take a deep breath and curb anger. Work is excellent therapy for "the blues."

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): One of your plans could succeed far beyond your fondest dreams. Strike a bargain in order to obtain your heart's desire. An excellent evening for romance and happy pastimes. Stroll down Memory Lane.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You need to be more prudent than usual in your financial dealings this month. Someone may attempt to pull the wool over your eyes. A lack of sleep could undermine your health.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Look your best today. Your loved ones make great claims on your time and energy. They need to learn new values. This is no time to gamble with your money or emotions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Concentrate on building stronger relationships. Do not antagonize those you will need on your team. Business entertainment will pay off handsomely. Ask the bank to raise your credit line.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You are moving into position to make a remarkable comeback at work. Follow your heart. Something you have held in reserve should be released. Financial worries subside. Keep your car in good repair.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Take advantage of an unusual opportunity. Be more affectionate. Time is on your side where a parent-child conflict is concerned. Strengthen a promising alliance. Spend more evenings with your family.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Focus on your long-term goals. A computer helps bring important records up to date. A child or friend needs extra encouragement. Try to arrange your work schedule to suit your family better.

Around the A-10: The game of the week is Penn State at St. Joseph's next Thursday. St. Joe's is first in the league at 12-0 (16-3 overall) while PSU is second at 10-0 (16-3 overall.) They rank 1-2 in every offensive category in the league.

Numbers: Helen Freeman is the leading scorer for the Minutewomen, averaging 13.6 ppg. She's also the top rebounder with 7.1 rebounds per game . . . The top field goal shooter is Keyburn McCusker. She's hitting shots at a 50 percent clip . . . As a team the Minutewomen are hitting 42 percent of their shots . . . The starting guards, Serafini and Pytko, lead the team in turnovers with an average of 9.6 per game . . . For the season UMass has committed 471 turnovers compared to opponents who have turned the ball over 298.

Keys-to-Winning Dept.: In the three UMass victories this season a pattern has emerged. When the front court plays well the Minutewomen are a capable team. In those three games Lisa Hair, Freeman and McCusker have combined for 61 percent of the field goals and 60 percent of the points.

Wonder Woman Watch: St. Joseph's center Dale Hodges was named Co-Player-of-the-Week in the Atlantic 10 last week. She averaged 30 ppg and 11.3 rebounds and hit 34-of-53 from the field (64 percent).

transfer. They want to play this season, but they're bitter. They want to show what they can do, showcase their stuff."

Murphy, however, feels that some of the players will stay around, despite the possibility of not playing lacrosse.

"A few were initially going to do it, but the NCAA is going to let them keep their scholarships," Murphy said, adding that only a couple were actually getting financial support.

"A lot of the kids might stick it out. A few are looking at other schools," she said. "But they're really gung-ho about somehow playing."

Johnson said that several members of the men's tennis team were put in similar situations. One in particular, Barry Wadsworth of South Hadley, just transferred here this year from Penn State, and now faces a dilemma about making another venue change. Other players may lose out-of-state tuition waivers.

Despite the disappointments, those affected realized that something had to be done, given the current fiscal crisis.

"We're mad that it's happening at all. There were going to have to be cuts, in order for other people to survive," Bossio said. "And this is probably only the first wave."

"This must have been one of the hardest decisions [McInerney] has ever made," Yarworth said. "He's a champion of the minor sports. It would have been easy for him to write them all off. But he wants to have a broad-based program."

season into a personal growth experience."

With the outcome of the meet never in doubt, some of the Minutemen had the chance to look at the lighter side of competition. Senior co-captain John Eggers, an intense competitor, fell twice during his high bar routine. "Sometimes you just get way too serious and have to step back and laugh at things," Eggers said. "If this was the EIGLs [Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League championships] I sure wouldn't be laughing like this, though."

"I tried to add two new tricks to my high bar routine, and they just didn't work out tonight," Eggers said, explaining his problems on high bar.

The Minutemen will try to maintain their jovial attitude for Saturday at 1 p.m., when they take on MIT at Boyden Gymnastics Center.

Men's gymnastics thumps Dartmouth

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team took a 224.05-152.15 decision from Dartmouth College at Boyden Gymnastics Center last night, easily raising its record to 3-3.

The meet provided coach Roy Johnson with the opportunity to experiment with different combinations, as Dartmouth dressed just four gymnasts.

"We still have to get our guys to hit their routines on high bars and pommel horse," Johnson said. "Vaulting was a positive event for us tonight, though."

Individually, Johnson praised the efforts senior co-captain Bart Balocki and freshman Mitch Hall on parallel bars, as well as sophomore Bill Sayman and senior Carl Russ on vaulting.

Freshman Rob Thomas had an opportunity to show off his skills, competing as an all-arounder for the first time in his young collegiate career. "I didn't know I was going to do all-around until two or three days ago," Thomas said. "Hopefully this will give me a chance to know what to expect for bigger meets later on."

"I did better than I expected to on parallel bars and pommel horse," Thomas added. "It's kind of hard to get up for a meet like this — we're at a higher standard than Dartmouth is. You just have to go out and try to meet your own personal goals."

Thomas' overall score of 45.2 was just a hair behind meet high scorer Sandy Ganzell's score of 45.25. The Dartmouth sophomore was particularly pleased with his performance on vault (8.60) and parallel bars (7.85).

Although Dartmouth was not at the same level as UMass, last night's meet represented the Big Green's highest scoring performance in two seasons. "Prior to this meet, our highest score this season was 144, which we were looking to beat," said Dartmouth Coach Keith Van Winkle. "I'm really pleased with the kind of job our four guys came in and did."

"We saw this meet as a builder for New Englands," Dartmouth captain Kevin Lewis said.

"With only four guys competing, it's very difficult to beat out teams with five scores," Lewis added. "We just want to keep on improving our own scores and make this

Athletes, coaches react to budget crisis

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

In light of Tuesday's announcement that four University of Massachusetts varsity sports would be affected by budget cuts, members of those teams yesterday expressed anger and concern about the situation.

The announcement, made by UMass Athletic Director Frank McInerney, stated the women's lacrosse program would be suspended following the 1990 season, the men's and women's tennis spring seasons would be suspended after this year, and the water polo team would no longer receive University funds.

The general attitude of those hurt by the cuts seemed to be, "Why us?" But none of those harmed by the decision are going to go down without a fight.

"We just had a meeting [last night], and talked about maybe going out and getting corporate sponsorship," said Sue Murphy, a senior All-America in women's lacrosse. "The girls are really devastated about the situation. We're really upset.

"We're going to do what we can," she said. "We're not going to go down, and get swept under the rug."

The same holds true for the men's tennis team, which also has seen this spring's trip to Morgantown, W.Va. for the Atlantic 10 championships washed out.

"They should let us play out the spring [schedule]," said senior Chris Johnson. "I offered to take my father's Suburban [to the A-10's] and bring boxes of macaroni and cheese from Stop & Shop. If we do go, it's incentive to get us fired up."

Johnson feels that the team, which finished 8-1 in the fall and captured the ECAC championship, would benefit greater from playing a spring schedule and competing in the A-10s.

"I'd say, wipe out the fall season," he said. "We've got to have spring and the conference matches. Tennis across the nation is in the spring, and it's best to go at the best competition, which is in the A-10."

Even with the spring schedule gone, those in the program know there is still something left for them.

"I feel terrible about the cuts, but I really thought they were going to cut the [tennis] program," said Carol Ford, program head for tennis. "With tennis it could have been worse. We had been expecting the worst."

The water polo team, despite the loss of funding, will also be able to continue competing, primarily because it had a small operating budget of about $5,000 a year.

"It's a cheap sport to run," said coach Russ Yarworth. "We'll have fund-raisers within the team, and hopefully create even stronger alumni support. I think the alumni will want to help out, they don't want to see water polo die."

Yarworth, who is also the men's swimming coach, said that the close relation between the two teams has helped ease the problem.

"Most of the polo team is made up of swimmers," he said. "They're tied in so closely, a lot of the recruiting and administrative expenses are the same. It is basically one program."

Yarworth realizes how lucky his team was compared to the others affected. With schedules and entire programs being scrapped, the futures of the members of those teams are now up in the air.

Women's lacrosse coach Patti Bossio, who also serves as assistant field hockey coach, said she is leaving the University after this season.

"I played here. I'm sad, because this has been so important to me, a big part of my life," Bossio said. "I've had so much enjoyment, it's been so successful. Now it's gone."

Bossio said many of the team's younger players are also considering leaving to play elsewhere.

"The younger kids came here for good academics and to play lacrosse," she said. "Now they are looking to

UM hoop teams hit the hardwood tonight

• Women try to snap losing streak vs. GW

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team looks to put the brakes on a seven-game losing streak tonight when it entertains George Washington at Curry Hicks Cage in a 7:30 p.m. contest.

As one would expect with a 3-16 record (1-10 in the Atlantic 10) team the numbers ain't pretty. In those seven losses the Minutewomen have been outscored by almost 22 points per game. Tonight's opponent, the Colonial Women, walked all over UMass the first time around, winning by 32, 80-48.

But there is hope in tonight's game. First, coach Kathy Hewelt wants to make something clear about the first GW encounter. "There's no way the first score indicates the difference in the two teams," she said.

And further more, it's not like GW is the caliber of a Temple or a Penn State. The Colonial Women enter tonight's game with a record of 10-8 (5-6 in the league). So the possibility of a UMass victory is quite real.

"I really do," says Hewelt when asked if she thinks her team has a shot to win tonight. "The primary reason why, is that right now our kids appear very motivated. They were embarrassed the first time they played them. And I think some of our egos got bruised a little bit."

For UMass to win, it must do a good job on the defensive end against GW's dynamic point guard Karin Vadelund. The 5-foot-6 senior is averaging 14.3 ppg and is one of the top three-point shooters in the league. Coming into tonight's contest she has hit 21-of-55 from behind the three-point line, a percentage of 38.2.

"She's a very good three-point shooter and she penetrates well," said Hewelt. "She's also very quick and our problem is we don't have anyone as quick as she is."

Vadelund receives help from forward Jennifer Shasky who is averaging 14.3 ppg. She has been named Rookie-of-the-Week four times this season in the Atlantic 10. Rounding out the starting five is forward Cortella Jones, center Rachel Mercer and guard Anne Riley.

"They're a small team which causes us some problems because we're bigger but slower," said Hewelt. "Offensively they're a running team. They look to force the turnovers and run."

Health Services Dept.: Helen Freeman is still nursing a sprained knee. In addition to that she has cuts on multiple areas of her body as a result of the Penn State game . . . Sue Serafini and Lisa Hair are slowed by sprained ankles.

Long Distance Shooting Dept.: UMass as a team is shooting 28 percent (26-93) from the three-point line. Patty Robak (3-13), Michele Pytko (2-16) and Serafini

• Minutemen face key A-10 tilt vs. Rutgers

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

As recently as last week, noted hoop-guru Dick Vitale was calling them one of the true disappointments of 1989-90.

But just when everyone was fleeing the bandwagon, Rutgers University suddenly woke up yesterday at 7-3 in the Atlantic 10 (11-9 overall), proving that maybe last year wasn't a fluke.

Tonight, the University of Massachusetts (12-8, 7-4) travels to Piscataway in hopes of derailing RU's newborn title hopes (7:30 p.m. from the Louis Brown Athletic Center), and also to improve their position for the stretch run in the A-10 race.

UMass has already beaten the Knights this season, 84-73 on Jan. 4 at the Cage. But time has passed and a lot has changed since then, mostly on the positive side for Rutgers.

Other players have stepped up and taken the load, notably freshmen Donnell Lumpkin and Mike Jones, and junior Keith Hughes.

"They are a very good team," said UMass coach John Calipari. "Their chemistry is different. It's been addition by subtraction."

The key formula seems to have been the loss of forward Tom Savage to academic ineligibility two weeks ago. Savage, the team's top scorer from a year ago, was struggling this year, mostly a malady caused by not getting the rock enough.

The same knock has been used against point guard Earl Duncan, who suffered an injury in Sunday's win over West Virginia. Duncan sat out Tuesday night's loss to St. John's at Madison Square Garden, but is expected to play tonight.

Calipari doesn't buy the Duncan criticism.

"He forces some shots, but sometimes kids, when they're hurt, play more within themselves and play better," Calipari said.

In that sense, injury may actually help Rutgers. But the picture isn't quite so positive for the Minutemen. Freshman forward Harper Williams, who suffered an ankle injury in last week's loss to Connecticut, is still a question mark for tonight, though Calipari is hopeful.

A more recent problem arose when senior guard Cary Herer came down with the flu, and spent Tuesday night at Health Services.

"I just hope Cary and Harper can play," Calipari said.

"We have to box out well and rebound," he said. "If we give up 15 offensive rebounds, there's no way we can win."

Calipari also expects a lot of zone defense from the Knights, which would open up the outside game. Rafer Giles, coming off a career-high 27 points in Monday's win over Vermont, will be a key player along with sophomore Jim McCoy, who managed just seven points against the Catamounts.

SINGING FOR THE RIGHT TO CHOOSE

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

In this writer's humble opinion, there are few things better than a good concert with a slew of talented and underrated performers.

Clay Lady Productions is offering one of those few better things, as they bring a slew of talented and underrated performers together — for a good cause.

This Sunday afternoon, Casselberrry-Dupree, Mary Chapin Carpenter, Garnet Rogers and Chris Smither perform a pro-choice concert to benefit the Abortion Rights Fund of Western Mass.

Casselberry-Dupree, which should be a synonym for "raw power," left the crowd hot, sweaty and exhausted after they opened for Jimmy Cliff in the area last year. Their soulful reggae music, occasionally sprinkled with folk and gospel, packs more punch than Mike Tyson. They can even take a song like the Eagle's "Take it to the Limit" and make it their own.

But there's also a message to their music. Their award winning album, City Down, is full of songs denouncing apartheid and celebrating women's rights. It's often hard to stop dancing and actually listen to the words, but they're worth hearing.

Mary Chapin Carpenter, who hails from Washington D.C., is one of the hottest acts to appear on the country scene. Her rock/country blends infuse her songs with a jolt that is often missing from the music of bland country acts such as Randy Travis.

Probably the most unsung hero performing is Garnet Rogers. A sort of Renaissance man, Rogers is an accomplished songwriter, arranger and producer. He also plays guitar and violin, and his voice has a wider range than Larry Bird's jump shot.

Rogers' songs are reminiscent of John Steinbeck's novels, literate, sensitive and with a deep sense of purpose. His heroes are everyday people achieving little victories. Performed live, his songs emit even more intensity.

Rounding out the bill is Chris Smither. A well-respected studio musician and songwriter, Smither penned "Love You Like a Man" and "I Feel the Same" for Bonnie Raitt.

The New Orleans native performs with great charm and ease. Like Rogers, Smither's songs are often dark and complex. They are even more so live, with Smither often going from a whisper to a scream in a matter of seconds.

The Abortion Rights Fund of Western Mass is a grassroots organization dedicated to defending women's lives and freedoms. Their services and programs include loaning money for abortions and subsidizing free pregnancy tests. They have also organized a speaker's bureau and post-abortion support groups.

The Pro-Choice Benefit Concert takes place Sunday at 2 p.m. at the Academy of Music in Northampton. Tickets are $18.50. Donor and patron tickets are also available.

Why Buffalo are far superior to Dinosaurs

By WILLIAM GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

It goes by too many names, but what one critic called the "Massachusetts underground hardcore scene," makes great copy.

European hacks, always hungry for something new to justify their intangible existences, have been extolling the virtues of bands such as Dinosaur Jr., Buffalo Tom, the Lemonheads et. al., for a couple of years now. And 2000 miles away it must look pretty glam.

But it's criticism, an art unto itself, that thrives on contradictions to the extent of shrouding all pretensions of sincerity.

From a few feet away there's no glamour, just an energetic hard truth. A truth seemingly based on sound.

We can take the lineage back as far as J. Mascis' association with Sonic Youth. This stroke of luck led the man behind Dinosaur Jr. to get his band onto the SST label, prompting untold flights of fancy sliding into the decay of musical regurgitation.

What good came of it? Mascis made some good music, with Ciccone Youth's The Whitey Album and his own You're Living All Over Me showing some definite promise that has not been lived up to. He also produced Buffalo Tom.

Since day one, Buffalo has been compared to the Dinos unfairly. Chris Colbourn, the band's co-bassist, co-guitarist and co-vocalist dispelled those rumors over the phone.

"There are a lot of similarities, like to my mother we sound alike, but to someone who really listens, we don't. We're a three-piece — guitar, bass and drums — and we're loud. So people make that connection, but we think we sound more like Husker Du."

At Dinosaur's core you'll find nothing. The band is the most overblown piece of clever hype known, concentrating on an audience out of the mainstream. They've assaulted the senses with a lot of noise covering up nothing. No semblance of songwriting ability, soul, nor anything but a capability with loud instruments is on show. That's where the difference with Buffalo Tom appears.

"The Europeans think we have a folk undercurrent, like Phil Ochs. There's a lot of open chords and distortion in our sound, but they can all be played acoustically," Colbourn said.

Nice things: Buffalo Tom originated at UMass, a place that all three members graduated from in 1988. Colbourn also spoke of a formative academic experience called Professor David Lenson, hero of the Comparitive Literature department.

"He's certainly one of our favorite professors. He really opened my eyes to a lot of things."

Funny things: "We started playing at Umass; it's been four years now. But it became much easier to play other places, like in Europe. We lived in Northampton, and we played very loud. I remember seeing Dinosaur play at Sheehan's, and about 12 people were there rolling their eyes. Also, we'll never forget playing at Katina's to a snake pit, it was quite an experience."

Attitude: "It's hard to take the whole rock thing so serious in 1990. We've just been really lucky."

Colbourn also had a lot to say about Buffalo's support acts at tonight's show at Pearl Street, Sebedo and Soo Yung from Bitch Magnet. Sebedo has Lou Barlow, the best part of Dinosaur Jr., who's recently left them, and Eric and Jason, both of whose last names escape me. Jason is also the drummer for the Caroline Know, who'll be playing Club Soda this Saturday night for an all-ages show.

"They're great," Colbourn said, "Lou was very different, and doing it while he was still with them. They're also playing with us at Ground Zero in Boston on Valentine's Day."

Soo Yung, the vocalist from Bitch Magnet is someone who a lot of people are excited about for a variety of good reasons. He'll be opening the show, that's open to anyone aged 18 or older tonight.

LBGA weekend fun

The LBGA is welcoming everyone back this weekend by holding their first monthly LBGA dance of the spring semester. The event will be held in the Bluewall on Saturday night from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. There is a $3 admission charge and there will also be a bar for those over 21 who wish to imbibe.

On Friday, the LBGA hosts a coffee social from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. on the 9th floor of the Campus Center. The socials are held every Friday and offer free refreshments. They're a great, casual way to find out what's going on in the gay community and network. Anyone is encouraged to stop by and hang out.

The Program for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Concerns currently offers a monthly newsletter which includes a calendar of local events. If you would like to receive a copy via mail, call or stop by the Program office in the lobby of John Adams Tower in Southwest, 545-4824.

Church member finds a new congregation

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

Armed with only his voice and acoustic guitar, singer/songwriter Marty Willson-Piper will be performing at the Iron Horse Friday night.

Willson-Piper, lead guitarist of the art-rock group the Church, has combined his band's style with some of his more personal influences, to create his own unique sound.

In Reflection, Willson-Piper's first solo effort, was released in 1987. Many critics found the release astounding, surprised at Willson-Piper's successful combination of Church-like pop songs and Syd Barret/Pink Floyd-influenced instrumentals. In Reflection was only released as an import however, and unfortunately failed to receive the press it deserved.

It wasn't until 1988, when the Church tightened-up their sound and released Starfish, a minor mainstream hit, that Willson-Piper began to gain critical recognition as a talented solo artist. Two other members of the Church, Steve Kilbey and Peter Koppes, released solo albums as well, but neither were greeted as enthusiastically as Willson-Piper.

In 1988, Willson-Piper's critcally-lauded Art Attack, was issued on Rykodisc. Art Attack was Willson-Piper's first U.S. release, and contained six tracks from In Reflection, plus an assortment of more folk-influenced/acoustic songs.

On Art Attack, Willson-Piper successfully combines political opinions, as in "Evil Queen of England," with more mainstream pop songs, as in the single, "She's King."

Marty Willson-Piper plays a solo acoustic show at the Iron Horse tomorrow night.

"I hope this (Art Attack) will convince people that great music is not big money, big promotion or big studios," Willson-Piper said.

In the fall of 1989, Willson-Piper released Rhyme. Influence-wise, Rhyme is as far removed from the Church as you can get. The first single, entitled "Questions Without Answers," is a melodic pop song, that is a prime example of Willson-Piper's ability to mix 60s psychedelia and contemporary folk.

On Rhyme, Willson-Piper demonstrates his flair for the innovative by enhancing his sound with instruments such as cello, violin and bagpipes, without overpowering his acoustic guitar.

Tracks such as "St. Germain," where Willson-Piper includes touches of flamenco guitar, and the philosophical "Time is Imaginary," with its spoken-word introduction, are particular stand-outs.

Marty Willson-Piper will be performing a completely acoustic set on Friday night. Showtime is 7 p.m.

Carthy and Swarbrick kiss the world goodbye

By CHRISTOPHER McNEICE
Collegian Correspondent

Martin Carthy and Dave Swarbrick shall grace the Valley with wit and tune come Sunday evening.

The London musicians have put together a "Farewell to the World Tour," which will have them tramping over this great geographical expanse, as well as a few other former members of the British Empire; Australia, New Zealand, and Hong Kong.

It is their fourth such farewell, the first a result of a pact between the two, which said they would join the slew of artists engaged in this popular new practice, only when a peripheral folk band by the name of the Liverpool Spinners did so, secure in the knowledge that this would happen only if an actor were elected president of the United States.

Needless to say, the first tour was so successful they've decided to continue, presumably because they received some perverse enjoyment from a sense of impending destruction. They have worked together previously to these rounds of tearful bow-taking, playing an important part in the British folk scene, from which they both hail, during its revolutionary years in the late 60s.

Carthy is a long-respected guitarist and singer and a sage-song collector. His latest album is comprised mostly of reworked tunes of a collection of long-lost pre-World War I recordings he discovered in an old English manor house. He's played with Steeleye Span, Albion Country Band and Brass Monkey, and has most recently performed with the Waterstons, John Kirkpatrick and solo. Swarbrick is a wise and influential folk/rock fiddler who has worked with the Ian Campbell Group and Fairport Convention, which he left in 1984 to form Whippersnapper.

Their acoustic set, consisting of new interpretations of antiquated melodies and contemporary melodies, is especially appealing to fans and connoisseurs of folk music.

Martin Carthy and Dave Swarbrick will appear at the Iron Horse on Sunday, Feb. 11. The concert begins at 7 p.m. Advance tickets are $10. The show is presented by Celtic Angel.

Mass. Wildlife Society predicts plenty of snow

By ALISA HABIB
Collegian Correspondent
and AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

The environmentally-minded students of the University of Massachusetts Wildlife Society will be holding a fund-raiser, featuring the music of the Mark Snow Band, to help support their causes on Feb. 9.

This concerned group, mainly composed of students majoring in areas of the Natural Resources department, is a student chapter of the Professional Organization for Wildlife Biologists. The society's main objective is to prevent the degradation of the wildlife population. They hope to increase awareness of the importance of wildlife. Many people don't appreciate the values of nature's creatures, and this lack of concern has had detrimental effects. The members of the society are highly-skilled professionals who have dedicated their lives to the preservation and management of wildlife.

The organization communicates its important messages by publishing numerous journals. They keep on top of the political aspects of the conservation issue by making proposals and recommendations to government agencies and other natural resource organizations.

The UMass chapter holds regular meetings to express their concerns and help fight for the rights of the diminishing wildlife population. They also host various guest speakers in the field. These specialized professionals lecture on topics from "Bat Morphology" to "The Art of Falconry."

The student group also tries to keep the fun in their organization through field trips, various social events and even an annual softball game.

This year, the UMass chapter is pleased to be hosting the 21st Annual Northeastern Wildlife Society Student Conclave. They are expecting students from Virginia to Canada to come and participate. The event is to take place on the weekend of April 20, and they have planned a full agenda.

In an attempt to cover the cost of the annual event, the organization will be occupying a table at the concourse offering t-shirts, posters and raffle tickets.

On Friday, Feb. 9, the Mark Snow Band will be playing at Seven-O's, who just recently received their entertainment license, in Sunderland. Snow has played there previously to an overwhelming response. The $5 admission charge will help support the cost of the Conclave.

A well-established musician, Snow has been playing with the country-rock Sundown band for 15 years. He has recently formed the Mark Snow Band.

"The band is basically a benefit, jam band," said Snow of his new project. "We're not into making money. My other band is much more serious.

The benefit band consists of Snow on lead vocals and guitar, Matt LeClaire on rhythm guitar and vocals, Frank Suess, a well respected local musician, on drums and Dan Knauf, manager of Hilton music store, on bass.

"We're into having fun," said Snow. "If someone misses a note, we laugh about it over a beer at break."

Unlike the country tinge of Sundown, the Mark Snow Band plays more oldies rock, or, as Snow calls it, "good beer drinking, dancing, party type music." Their songlist includes classics from the Rolling Stones and Creedence Clearwater Revival.

Snow is also an avid lover of nature. He fondly remembers the days when he would hunt for food with his father. These days, his favorite form of relaxation is fishing. He is a strong supporter of the Wildlife Society.

"It's a great cause as far as I'm concerned," he said.

De-mystifying F.W. de Klerks' recent speech

Students wary of President's intentions

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Several members of South African student organizations cautioned yesterday that despite President F.W. de Klerk's plans announced last Friday to legalize the African National Congress and release imprisoned leader Nelson Mandela, economic sanctions against South Africa should be intensified.

At a news conference held at the University of Massachusetts, Tandi Mvakali, UMass student and president of the Azanian student movement, said she wanted to "de-mystify" de Klerk's speech.

Calling for an end to the racial violence that has plagued South Africa, she demanded the immediate release of the "thousands of political prisoners still being held in jail."

"Mr. Nelson Mandela is not the only political prisoner in South Africa," she said.

The impending release of Mandela should not distract people from the apartheid system that still exists in South Africa, Mvakali said.

"South Africa is still under occupation," she said. "It is still being regulated. The apartheid system is still thriving."

Sekhulumi Ntsoale, UMass student and president of the African Student Association, said he is pleased that President Bush has acknowledged the success of current economic sanctions against South Africa, but warned against lifting them "until the apartheid system is completely destroyed."

"What F.W. de Klerk has created with his proposals is a climate of confusion," he said. "[South Africa] needs continued international commitment to push sanctions."

Mpho Mohlala, UMass graduate student, said the ANC's peaceful attempts at negotiation with the de Klerk administration have proven "fruitless" and violence has continued.

"If violence is the only language the government understands," he said, "I personally can't rule it out."

Mvakali added, "The South African government has taken up this violence as a political means to get what it wants."

Zengie Mangaliso, UMass doctoral student of sociology said although she is excited about de Klerk's actions, she believes they are "stalling tactics" to relieve the international pressure on de Klerk to end apartheid.

She also charged de Klerk with playing politics for his personal benefit, "He's only [reforming] for himself."

Gay harassment on the rise

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

During the 1988-1989 school year at the University of Massachusetts, there were 20 reported cases of homophobic harassment for which disciplinary action was sought, a figure considerably higher than the previous year when only one case was reported, said the director of human relations.

Grant Ingle, director of human relations, said the rise of reported cases is not due to a new outbreak of homophobic harassment, but to improvements at the University for helping students report the incidences.

One of these improvements is a clearer definition of harrassment, which now includes more than physical violence, he said.

"Harassment can range from threats over the telephone, graffiti, vandalized property, and now with the Massachusetts Gay Civil Rights Bill, it also includes housing and employment," Ingle said.

He said even though the University has no centralized system of reporting homophobic harassment, there are eight agencies on campus that can handle the complaints. This makes it difficult to account for all cases of harassment, especially since many are not classified as homophobic, Ingle said.

Students can report homophobic harassments to the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns; the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance; the Campus Police; the Amherst Police; the EveryWoman's Center; the Dean of Students office; the Ombudsman office and Resignations requested, attorney generals refuse

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima and Commuter Area Government member Ted Chambers, called for the resignation of Student Attorney General Jonathan Anastas and Assistant Student Attorney General Keith Strier in a press statement yesterday.

The call surfaces after Anastas reportedly asked for the resignations of Nakajima and Chambers Monday afternoon for alleged violations of Section C of the Student Code of Conduct, and Section D of Miscellaneous Regulations of the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities handbook, Chambers said.

Section C, article 3, prohibits the "unauthorized presence in or use of University premises, facilities or property." Section D states, "Students' living facilities and other University property may not be used for a business office, soliciting headquarters, etc."

The investigation centers around the use of telephones in the Student Government Association office by Chambers, Nakajima, and CAG member Robb Smith to contact prospective student voters on behalf of the Evelyn Murphy campaign, and to request

GEO marches in protest of administration's silence

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

A small group of graduate student employees from the labor studies department marched from the Student Union to the Whitmore Administration Building yesterday to express to University administrators their concerns over union negotiations.

The group, all members of the Graduate Employee Organization, made an appointment to speak with Provost Richard O'Brien when told that he was not available. But his secretary called the group back soon after and cancelled.

GEO has been pressing University administrators to recognize the organization as a union since they became affiliated with District 65/United Auto Workers last November.

In a written statement to the students, O'Brien said: "The Administration is conducting good faith discussions with the Graduate Employee Organization, which it assumes speaks for graduate employees. While discussions are going on it would be inappropriate to meet with subgroups of the GEO."

Leslie Lomasson, a labor studies graduate student and district organizer of the District 65/UAW, said while the negotiations have been productive, "We have not reached an agreement on any issue because the basic language is inadequate as it reads now."

Lomasson said the University's proposal of a financial aid package to cover a $400 curriculum fee levied this semester is not acceptable because it excludes foreign students as well as research assistants, which constitute one third of GEO.

"The GEO would prefer fee waivers as a condition of employment like other employees receive health benefits," she said. "It is degrading to have to apply for your wages at the Financial Aid Office."

The University has refused to recognize the GEO as a union, stating that only the Board of Regents, which oversees the state's higher education system, can authorize this action.

But Renee Heberle, member of the GEO coordinating committee, said recognition of the union is the cornerstone of an agreement with the University because without it the graduate employees would still not have any collective bargaining powers.

Although the final decision to take a job action rests with the GEO membership, Heberle said unless GEO's demands are met, a strike of graduate student employees is possible.

Susan Beucheler, an English graduate student, said English and philosophy graduate students plan a march from Bartlett Hall to Whitmore at noon to present a petition in support of the GEO.

the office of Human Relations.

He said this problem may be solved soon with the Hate Crimes Bill, currently being voted on in the Massachusetts legislature.

The bill would consider the motivation of a crime against a particular minority group, Ingle said. These groups presently include women, various ethnic minorities and there is currently heavy lobbying to include homosexuals, he said.

If the bill passes, the state will have clear numbers of hate crimes against minorities and may result in a centralized system of reporting these crimes at the university as well, Ingle said.

Although the number of students reporting homophobic harassment is rising, Felice Yeskel, director of the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns, said there are still many more unreported cases.

According to a 1988 homophobic harassment survey conducted by the Program, almost 50 percent of the gay, lesbian and bisexual respondents reported they had been personally harassed or threatened on campus, though only one case of harassment was filed that year.

Yeskel said the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns has dealt with harassment by education and enforcing homophobic harassment policies at the University.

"We have let it be known that all harassment won't be tolerated at the University, and we have the power to take disciplinary action against those who break the policies," she said.

Yeskel said students should feel free to report all forms of harassment, adding that incidences that go unreported are "very problamatic" and only give the message that harassment will be tolerated.

Literacy expert suggests help for inner-city schools

By LINDSAY HOADLEY
Collegian Correspondent

New approaches in literary education can help low achievers in inner-city high schools, said Jay Robinson, linguist and literacy expert.

"We must build the kind of environment where a kid feels really comfortable in some sort of way, wherever they happen to be, and just keep working with them."

Robinson, of the University of Michigan, said this environment is a classroom where underacheivers are grouped together and encouraged to write about themselves, and share their self-examinations with other students.

Robinson, who spoke at the University of Massachusetts yesterday, is part of this year's Literacy Speakers Series at UMass. His lecture, 'The Social Context of Literacy', focussed on a number of case studies done on a class of 36 inner-city students in Michigan, aimed at assessing and treating barriers in writing and creativity.

According to Robinson, a major contributor to a student's inability to write is the fear of facing one's own life and past, especially if this has not been a pleasant one.

Through encouraging self-examination, Robinson said, students can relate to writing in a useful and enlightening way. Grouping these students together and encouraging them to share their written experiences further helps the student to recognize writing as a form of valuable communication with society, Robinson said.

"We had many numbers of kids say that it was the first time in their lives that they had realized that others have had their same problems," Robinson said. "These kids don't talk easily to one another. You have to build that kind of environment in writing."

Robinson cited examples of many texts written by students in the experiment, each which illustrated the success of the study.

The final two speakers in the Literacy Speakers Series are Brian Street, of the University of Sussex, United Kingdom, who will be on campus April 11-13, and Gail Weinstein-Shr, of Temple University, May 3.

BOG leadership changes

New Chairperson Gordon sees Hart off

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

The Board of Governors played musical chairs last night, filling the position of one chair while announcing the vacancy of another.

The BOG unanimously voted Sue Gordon as the new chairperson. The position, left vacant at the end of last semester when chairperson Charlotte Carter resigned, was filled over winter intersession by Vice-Chairperson Liz Hart. Since the beginning of the semester, BOG Treasurer Garron Carvalho has served as a temporary replacement.

Also last night, the Board accepted Vice-Chairperson Liz Hart's resignation. Hart said she is leaving because she needs to concentrate more on academics. Hart added that the BOG will remain an "extended hobby" for her, offering her services to help break in the new leadership.

"Basically, I'm leaving because my academics are calling me like a long lost friend," she said. "Like all graduating seniors, I want to leave here with a respectable [grade point average]."

Next week, the BOG will open nominations for a new vice-chair.

In other developments last night the BOG:

- Postponed the appointment of members to an ad-hoc committee to research the sale of pornography in the University Store until next week. The committee will consist of four students not affiliated with the BOG and five BOG members.
- Approved a "Banner and Poster Display Policy" for banners hung on the outside of the Campus Center parking garage. Under the new policy, banners must be made from fireproof materials and Registered Student Organizations who wish to hang a banner must make a request to do so two weeks in advance.
- Heard Governors Program Council Coordinator Jeff Glassman announce plans for a March 8 "Campuses Against Cancer Casino Night" to benefit brain tumor research.

Glassman said that unlike many casino-type fund-raisers, this one will use real money instead of play money or prizes. The Maasachusetts State Lottery Commission and the town of Amherst have issued gambling permits for the event, so everything will be legal, he said.

UMass, state to fight pests

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts, with the aid of the state Department of Food and Agriculture, has pioneered into the forefront of the field of pesticide management in the last decade.

UMass, which received a $43,000 grant from the state this year, is launching a program of Integrated Pest Management (IPM) education and certification, according to Craig Hollingsworth, certification program coordinator. This program is only being devloped by two other states in the nation, New York and Pennsylvania.

Hollingsworth said the education program, which revolves around an IPM short course to be held from March 26-29, is designed to inform local growers about reducing the use of pesticides harmful to the environment.

"IPM uses technology to protect public health in the enviornment," Hollingsworth said. "We work to put a biological control on pesticides which will be beneficial to both the commonwealth of Massachusetts and the farmers who are growing."

Paul Gosselin, an employee in the state Department of Food and Agriculture, said IPM has had an ongoing agreement with UMass regarding funding since the early 1980s.

"IPM research gives us a chance to see what works and what doesn't work,"Gosselin said. "Through our expansion over the years, we have allowed others to get involved as well as isolating those who don't want to work on pesticide reduction."

According to Gosselin, UMass receives over $100,000 for research on University owned farms as well as farms of private businesses.

"We need to do research and then bring it out in the field to test it," Gosselin said. "Area farmers should get some credit because they are taking our word against 40 to 50 years of government regulation and academia."

Gosselin said IPM is working toward reducing pesticides to the point where they may be phased out of use.

"This is only the beginning," he said. "We are trying to umbrella out and look toward alternatives."

Jewish holiday appreciates nature

> "I think that I shall never see

The Jewish community today observes the holiday of Tu B'Shevat, a celebration of trees and the environment.

Tonight, Hillel will hold a "Tu B'Shevat Seder," a service of appreciation for nature, at 7 p.m. in Campus Center room 177.

According to Aaron Silverman, a student who helped organize the Seder, the service will include a symbolic meal of certain fruits from the land of Israel.

Munching on treats such as oranges, apples, dates, figs, and walnuts, is one way for Jews to remind themselves not to take trees for granted, Silverman said.

"Tu B'Shevat is a joyous occasion, a day of the year which Jews set aside to consider their connection to the land around them and also the land of Israel," he said.

The book of Genesis, Silverman said, outlines a dualistic relationship between humans and their environment.

"In one sense, we have control of the land and can do what we want with it, but we also have a responsibility to take care of it," he said.

Yehudit Heller, Hillel program director, said the holiday traces back thousands of years to when the Jewish people were predominantly farmers.

"All their lives were connected to the land, but they weren't only thinking about wheat and flour. They also admired the beauty of nature," she said.

"Beautiful people are always compared to trees in the Bible," Heller said. "Tall people are compared to palm trees and wisdom is connected to trees too."

"Because we depend on our environment, we should treat it like we treat ourselves," she said.

Paraphrasing a passage from the book of Tehillim, Heller said, "A person is like a tree in the wilderness, always thirsting for water."

Another way to celebrate Tu B'Shevat, Heller said, is to plant a tree in Israel. Arrangements to do so, she said, can be made at the Hillel office.

"Trees symbolize the life cycle and continuation of the Jewish people," she said. "Trees take care of people so people should take care of trees."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Stand and up and be heard!

The world is changing. Everywhere, countries are addressing issues and attempting to deal with problems in a realistic way.
What about the United States? Will we join the planet in this revolution of the '90s?

John Patrick Musulin

President Bush recently sent a document to Congress that stated his assessment of our economy and outlined his plans for the future. He said that the situation is healthy and that he intends to continue the policies developed during the Reagan years.

Hello. Reality to the United States, come in please. Quick economics quiz: if you decrease your income and increase your spending, what will happen? Our national debt has tripled in the last ten years. This is supposed to be acceptable because we are all so much better off now, than we were before the Reagan revolution.

Disregard the Newspeak mumbo-jumbo indexes, percentages and studies; after you pay your bills, does your spendable income buy you more or less than it did ten years ago? If you are one of the "thousand points of light," you, no doubt, have noticed a great increase in your income and a decrease in your tax bill, thereby, improving your financial lot. The other two hundred and forty million of us have the same amount, or less than we did in 1980.

The bad news for the lower and middle class is they not only miss out on enjoying the benefits of this national debt (e.g. credit at your local Savings and Loan, a good deal on federal land, high-paying consultant's job with phantom defense contractor, etc.,) but they also have to pay for it.

How many U.S. bonds and treasury bills do you own? What would you do if people you didn't even know used your credit to go on a spending spree and had the bill sent to you? Oops. Too late, they already did.

Let's face it. For America to continue as a major player in the world scene, it will have to change with the rest of the world. If you disagree, pull out your grammar school history book and read up on the Roman and British Empires. They are just two examples of the bully on the block getting his nose busted.

Behavior modification: the country is no different than a person. It has to mature. It has to grow with the times. Our national priorities and attitudes need to be examined and changed to fit into the new global environment that is evolving.

The international stage is no longer a game of economic chess on an ever-expanding board, where only the United States and Russia get to play. We are no longer right, simply because we are big and bad.

And how about the concept of "enough." Isn't there a point at which we can be satisfied with a reasonable standard of living and lead a peaceful, happy life? What's wrong with accepting our role and improving what we have, instead of constantly needing more?

Manifest Destiny began as a rationale for forcibly acquiring everything between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Now that we've run out of space in North America and blatantly stealing real estate is no longer politically fashionable, Manifest Destiny has found a philosophical home in the idea of a continuously expanding economy.

The system is filled with so much voodoo and hokus-pokus that we're all too tired to pay attention. Maybe we better wake up, before it's too late.

Most people consider themselves too busy and too tired to stay politically informed and to participate in the process. They have lost faith in our "model system." This is the type of thinking that allows people to abuse and corrupt our country.

It is time for Americans to stand up and be heard. It is time to make changes. The rest of the world is leaving us in the dust.

"THIS OFFER VOID IN LITHUANIA AND OTHER BALTIC STATES. . . ."

Reap what has been sown

Well, it seems as though the seeds of change have taken a firm root behind the Iron Curtain.

Saturday and Sunday, hundreds of thousands of people, bearing signs and banners proclaiming "Soviet Army, Don't Shoot at Your Own People" and "Freedom Now," demonstrated in the streets of Moscow in the largest unofficial demonstration since the Bolsheviks seized power in 1917.

Jonathan Jewett

On the days proceeding, while the Communist party's Central Committee met inside the Kremlin, the inspired crowds called for an end to the Communists' monopoly on power and demanded a multi-party system of government.

Mikhail Gorbachev, whose radical policies of perestroika and glasnost instigated the wave of change sweeping through Eastern Europe, is now treading water in a political ocean of his own making.

Liberals believe that he is too radical, and radicals believe that the changes he promised are taking place too slowly. Nobody, least of all Gorbachev, would have believed at how quickly the other Warsaw Pact nations took the initiative to oust their Communist leaders and form more democratic governments.

Now, Gorbachev's creation has turned on its creator. The Soviet people have tired of the old political system, a system which has improved their social conditions very little, and want to follow the example set by their European allies.

But what will this mean for the United States? What should the government do?

First of all, it means a relaxation of tensions, possibly even to the point of a U.S. — Soviet detente.

The Cold War has ended, and we won. As the United States begins to withdraw troops from Europe, it should also cut the huge military budget amassed throughout the Reagan years. Peace will be more easily achieved without an ominous nuclear shadow overhead.

Secondly, the government should encourage the movement of the Soviet Union towards a more democratic society. This can be accomplished by sending advisors, goods and food to Russia and encouraging greater trade between the two countries.

Keeping Mr. and Mrs. Ivan Russian happy is the only way to solidify Gorbachev's national support. U.S. supplies would be gladly accepted by a lacking Soviet Union.

If Gorbachev falls from power, all that has taken place in Eastern Europe could collapse, and we could be right back where we started.

Let the Soviets view the West as a future ally, not a decrepit old adversary still clinging to anti-Communist rhetoric.

Thirdly, there should be a call for a major change in U.S. foreign policy. For a period of time proceeding World War II, its foreign policy was formulated with the intent of frustrating and checking Communism.

Now that East-West relations are improving, a complete turnaround is not only feasible but necessary as well.

As other countries are growing stronger, both economically and politically, the world could very possibly be headed for a multipolar international system.

The United States and the Soviet Union should use their resources, experience and knowledge to abet the development of up-and-coming countries.

Though it is thousands of miles away, the events happening now in the Soviet Union will reach and affect us in America.

These are very exciting times that we live in. The 80s ended on a note of peaceful revolution, and the 90s have begun with the same humane spirit of peaceful rebellion presiding.

It is time for America to look toward the future and emerge from the past as a role model for other nations. And reap what has been sown.

Students: Use your power!

Students have a common interest, and need to organize.

This means far more than organizing on campus, holding forums and joining student councils that are in the end controlled by the administration.

Crawford/Smith

We learned during last semester's student strike that the most effective way to ensure that our interests are represented is to wield power. The power to elect and the power to be elected.

Students have talked about mobilizing and running candidates for office since the onslaught of budget cuts toward Higher Education and Social Services began two years ago. Since then we have registered thousands of students and now its time to take our rightful place in government.

Registering only works if you vote.

Persons within Amherst Town Government continue to pass bylaws aimed at the town's student population without student input. There is a move to dismantle the Housing Review Board. Three of the four non-student candidates, Holstien, Gold, and Keenan, have publicly stated that the Board either should be abolished or is too pro-tenant.

The board is our only protection against unreasonable and outrageous rents. The mere existence of the Board has forced landlords to be careful about the rents they charge. We do not waver at all in our commitment to the Housing Review Board.

Dozens of other issues in the town affect students directly. Child care, education, and the environment cannot be having the town approve the Child Care linkage Bill, and approving a proposition two and a half override so the town does not fall in to the same budget problems that the state is in.

On the other side some in the town are proposing that bus services be cut, as well as social services, and the school system.

Only last year it was suggested that students be charged a head tax because we live here. Students make up half the town of Amherst, as well as supporting the town economy with over 18 million dollars a year. The University is by far the largest employer in the region and a major factor around the towns growth.

Clearly it is about time we held a little more power than a half dozen seats on Town Meeting.

Today, a primary will be held to narrow the number of candidates for Selectboard from six to four. For the first time in history students have a chance to attain two seats on Amherst's highest lawmaking body. Polls are open from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. at the usual polling place.

We humbly ask for your consideration and support.

Organizer Saul Alinsky said that there were and are only two kinds of power in the world "people and money." So if there is something we want or need as students we must use our people power, unless someone is going to give us collectively $26 million or so.

Use your power and vote today.

Brian James Crawford and Robb Smith are UMass students who are candidates for the Amherst Selectboard

Quote of the day

"Too often we . . . enjoy the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought."

Indirect homophobia a reality

There are many manifestations of homophobia found on this campus. Most of these, which receive the most attention, consist of direct action against homosexuals. David Mark's column ("Ignorance elects abuse" Feb. 6) focused on this representation. I entirely agree that homosexuals are not deserving of their treatment.

However, there is a facet of homophobia which has been ignored and justified by editorials regarding the homosexual community. This belief is anyone labeled as gay, must be gay. If the person is not openly gay, then he/she has simply not yet "come out of the closet."

This "reasoning" builds to the point that any action the person takes confirms the label. It also broadens the scope of other beliefs not only in reference to homosexuals but also to those of us who are not gay. I do not mean to fault any writer who has fallen into this "catch 22" but to point out that it should be in the minds of the writers and readers.

voter participation at the Saturday caucus for the state gubernatorial Democratic Nominating Convention.

CAG member Brian Crawford, who ran on the uncommitted slate at the caucus, is also under investigation.

The statement, signed by Chambers and Nakajima said, "There was no presumption of our innocence [on the part of Anastas]."

It further stated that they had not been notified of an actual investigation or what laws they had broken.

Chambers said he and Nakajima decided to ask for Anastas' and Strier's resignations after the Undergraduate Student Senate meeting Wednesday night, where both expected an apology from Anastas. An apology was not given and Anastas was on the absentee list for the meeting.

They responded to the request by stating, "The request for our resignations is a desperate act. The office of the Dean of Students has been previously informed about certain allegations and we are currently in the process of meeting with an assistant dean of students."

Last night Charmaine Wijeyesinghe, assistant dean of students, said she had spoken to Anastas on Wednesday and was aware of the situation. She said she would be meeting with students today regarding this matter, but did not make any additional comments on the matter.

Strier said, "As far as Johnathan and I are concerned, we have done nothing improper and there is no reason for us to resign."

After consulting their attorney, Benjamin A. Barnes, Nakajima and Chambers said that no illegalities were committed on their own part.

"They're the ones who made the mistake," said Nakajima.

Crawford, who is running for Amherst Select Board said his main concern was in regard to the primary for the election today.

Sidney Myers, associate university counsel, was asked whether the students had actually violated the Student Code of Conduct sections cited. Myers said if there is a controversy concerning a student he could not "pronounce judgement" on that individual, which he said he would be doing by answering the question through the medium of the press.

Both Strier and Anastas stressed the fact that the matter is out of their office and in the hands of the Dean of Students and that the four individuals involved were and are presumed innocent of conduct violations.

UMass students to be Republican delegates

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Eleven University of Massachusetts students will be delegates to the gubernatorial Massachusetts Republican Convention to be held March 10 in Boston.

The delegates were selected during a series of city and town committee meetings and senatorial caucuses held Jan. 1 to Feb. 3. Three students ran uncommitted, while seven ran on the Steven Pierce slate and one on the Bill Weld slate.

Jeffrey Turco, who ran on the Weld slate but said he supports Pierce, said that "this is the year of the Republican for Massachusetts."

"Only the Republicans have the competent leadership to get us out of this fiscal quagmire," he said.

Ted Maravelias, Pierce delegate, said students will make the difference at the convention and should support Pierce because of his stance on educational issues.

"[Pierce] wants to make sure every high school graduate can read his or her diploma," he said.

Garron Carvalho said he ran uncommitted because none of the candidates have "come out" with their stances on key issues.

He said Paul Cronin is the "best candidate for student issues" because he is in full support of aiding the higher education system.

Craig Donais, uncommitted delegate, said he is also "leaning toward Cronin because "[Cronin] has a very strong education stance that is the strongest out of all the candidates."

New Junk

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Staff

Hello and welcome to yet another Disc Junkie semester. Since space is limited, we'll make the introductions snappy: we listen to all sorts of sounds and we tell you about them. Everybody got it? Good, on with the show.

If you were alive and breathing last year, you may have heard the Yugoslavian group Laibach's covers of the Rolling Stones' "Sympathy for the Devil," or their Let it Be album which presented the Beatles' final album in an entirely different light.

Well, they've dropped their passion for cover tunes and released a soundtrack they made for the Deutshces Schauspielhaus production of "Macbeth" three years ago. This marks a return to ground surveyed by the government sponsored group on their two earlier albums, Nova Akropola and Baptism.

DISC JUNKIE

In other words, if you're looking for pop tunes performed to their trademark thudding Teutonic beat, forget it. This is gorgeous instrumental pomposity at its finest. Full of ambient effects, sampled shrieks and grunts and grandiose orchestration, it provides a perfect accompaniment to the Bard's bloody tale.

The only drawback we can find is that it is a woefully short album. If you are new to Laibach's take on symphonic music, go for one of the earlier instrumental records, they're much the same only longer, and Nova Akropola has more percussion.

We are not going to plunge back into the world of pop song structures yet. Instead, we take you on a detour into Negativland. The Bay Area band which uses this name, is famed for constructing soundscapes of found sounds and spoken words that only the generous would term 'songs." On their fifth album, Helter Stupid, they concoct more sound collages which are riddled with attacks on radio, and particularly the media. Their obsession with journalism of all kinds was triggered by a press release they wrote claiming that one of their songs may have had some connection to a quadruple ax murder. Naturally, everyone believed it and the story grew by leaps and bounds. You can read the whole story for yourself in the liner notes of the album.

At times funny, depressing and just plain strange, Helter Stupid will clear out your next party with dispatch. Can you afford to pass it up? We think not. Until next week. . .

You don't have to be twenty-one to dance to some good rock 'n' roll

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

If you've ever felt that being under 21 years of age was one of life's crueler tricks, you are not alone. Technically about three-fourths of all college undergraduates are under the legal drinking age.

This brings us into problems, because it's the younger crowd that most bands are catering to. And it's the underage crowd that Rockin' Dave of the Rent Party says have all the energy.

So what do you do if you want to boogie down to the area's best live music, while avoiding the extensive list of legal hassles a fake ID can, and does entail.

You can wait for an 18-and-over show at places like Pearl Street and Katina's, provided you're over 18. You can go to the Iron Horse, though there's generally no dancing there. Or you can go to Club Soda.

Club Soda is a non-profit nightclub created by the Northampton community to provide a place for younger people to dance and hang out.

But with the best dance floor in the area, a stage the size of Pearl Street's (upstairs) and an enviably professional array of sound and lighting equipment, as well as great acoustics, the club looks, feels and is the real thing — a contender in the small and very limited world of local clubs.

Which brings us to this Saturday night when the Rent Party, Fifth Business and The Caroline Know play an all-ages show at the club, the first live show put on in about 10 months.

Mike Doherty, manager of the club and a recent UMass graduate, said that the attempts to put on shows in the past have been thwarted by the choice of bands and the lack of finances available. He stressed that things will not repeat themselves, that the new slate of scheduled shows for Club Soda (including acts as varied as Free Press, the Ululators and Dinosaur Jr.) are with bands that tend to play for the pleasure of playing.

Doherty remembers dealing with bands like the Malarians (a popular local band last year) as being, "more of a headache than their music."

Now, though, Doherty is a lot more optimistic about putting on live shows. "After learning the ropes last year, I realized there's a lot of work in putting on a show, but with people helping it can be done."

So an independent company has stepped in to put on live acts. It calls itself Floyd Productions, but has no ties to anything pink.

"Floyd is an independent production company that's almost non-profit," he said. "It's an effort of trying to cater to the underage community, as well as providing a place where people who don't like alcohol around, can dance and have a good time."

Doherty continued, "I was talking to a friend, explaining the dilemma of not having any money to produce live shows, even though there was this great space to be used, and he suggested doing it ourselves. That was how Floyd was born."

He stressed that what he tried to do last year will not be repeated.

"Last year I was doing it all alone, without anybody helping me out, so now we have a lot of people into keeping it going like Rebeccah Keating and Marlo Doherty (both freshmen at UMass), who are strongly committed to having a place where younger people, like themselves, can go out to."

But why is the price at the door so high, if this is something for the community ?

"The overheads are kind of expensive. Each band is in it for a percentage, but a low one. We're just trying to put on a show. Everyone gets a piece of the pie at the end of the night; if their is a pie."

And what about the choice of bands?

"Of all the bands to play, the one I knew best was the Rent Party. I was so impressed with their music, and by the fact that they're not snobs. In the case of the Malarians show last April, I learned something. They came in with an attitude of really wanting to do something for the kids, but when it came right down to it they just wanted the money."

Without falling into more justified bitterness, Doherty and his partners feel very optimistic about the show.

"This time all the bands have really put their actions together with their words, all the bands are doing postering, and they're all as excited about the show as we are."

Indeed, Tom Mahnken, the bassist for Fifth Business, said that the underage crowd, "is the untapped reservoir of the rock 'n' roll kingdom." Rockin' Dave and the rest of the Rent Party are also well psyched.

And the future also looks good: the next show will be with Free Press, Kevin Keady and Kevin Colgan. And a reggae show with the Equalites and Uproot, is being tentatively scheduled.

Show starts at 8 p.m. Club Soda is located in the People's Institute on Gothic St. in Northampton. Advance tickets available from Mike Doherty at the People's Institute at 584-8313 for $5. All-ages welcome.

The comedy of a Soviet reality

By NICK OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

On Wednesday night, Russian-born, New York City-based artists Vitaly Komar and Alexander Melamid, who presented a two part slide show and informal lecture of their work at Amherst College.

In Part I, a core of irony and humor suffused their collaborations. Destiny ordained it from their birth. Born in the same hospital and raised in the same neighborhood in Moscow, they did not meet until they were students in 1967 at the Moscow Stroganov Institute for Art and Design.

Their submitted works for a 1973 youth section of the Moscow Union of Artists exhibition earned them an expulsion for, "distortion of Soviet reality and deviation from the principles of socialist realism."

Without official sponsorship, their exhibitions were mounted in and outdoor exhibition in 1974 their works were ground into the mud, garnering worldwide headlines in what has been subsequently been labeled the "Bulldozer Show."

With the international eye on Russia, the authorities garaged the bulldozers and arrested some artists. Others were confined to mental hospitals. Fortunately, Komar and Melamed were allowed to apply for emigration in 1977. Since then, their work has been displayed in some of the world's finest museums and galleries.

Now U.S. citizens, they reduced a crowd of mostly academics and intellectuals to a roomful of rollicking school-children with their slideshow and sidesplitting but pithy commentary.

Disenchanted with the trendy N.Y. art scene, they "taught" a dog to draw realistically, wryly inferring that the canine's final product is as worthy as some of what passes for genius in Manhattan. With the N.Y.C. skyline in the background, they devoted for public use a guillotine, displaying their "free use of metal and wood." In the style of Van Gogh, they painted a canvas of portraits of seven world leaders (Mao, Carter, Begin and Sadat, among them) with severed right ears.

Later in N.Y., they founded a business: the buying and selling of souls. In one slide they sit with Andy Warhol, who signs over to them the rights to his soul. For free. They show the document to prove it. They even superimposed Russian letters on a Times Square marquee advertising "Your Soul Is In Good Hands With Us." The business eventually collapsed because "everybody was selling and nobody was buying."

Remarkable in that he is hardly ever seen out of uniform and certainly never attending to his personal hygiene, Hitler is painted bare-chested sitting on a bench in his long underwear cutting his toenails. In another slide, the word "DEATH" in a bright and happy blue and yellow cartoon-colored background assumes a cheerfulness we in this society don't normally associate with this most taboo of subjects.

Part II featured their most recent major work, "Bergen Point Brass Foundry, Bayonne:" sketches, drawings, prints and paintings of the New Jersey foundry, its workers and the local landscape. Seeking exile from Manhattan, they sarcastically encouraged those of like mind to forsake the cool scene and flee to New Jersey with them "where the school of Bayonne is being born."

The proliferation of an art scene in Bayonne is not as absurd as it sounds, especially when one considers the vitality and influence of "punk music" which rose from the delapidated urban neighborhoods of Thatcher's post-industrial England.

The formal training and talent of Komar and Melamid blossom in this rich, earthy and realistic series of works devoted to the humble, hard-working employees of this foundry. With a crude grace highlighted by the igneous yellows and browns of these action paintings, they impart to these otherwise forgotten men a certain nobility, dignity and importance.

Komar said Bayonne's churches reminded them of ancient Rome, while the industrial ugliness and littered lots were like ruins and the foundry workers in their aprons like priests. Also included were sculptural arrangements in flowerpots of industrial garbage and the hearty herb wormwood, about the only plant able to survive in the contaminated soil.

Epidemic in Romania

AIDS problem kept secret

BUCHAREST, Romania (AP) — Nicolae Ceausescu's ban on contraception is being blamed for Romania's epidemic of AIDS among children, most of whom contracted the deadly disease through blood transfusions to treat malnourishment.

Government officials say AIDS was a state secret under the ousted Communist dictator and they now are publicizing the problem to gain international help to fight the disease.

Health minister Dan Enachescu said Wednesday that Romania has 74 confirmed cases of AIDS, including 50 children. About 600 Romanians carry the human immunodeficiency virus, - HIV - which causes AIDS, he said.

He did not say how many people were tested for the virus or how many had died of the disease.

Doctors blame Romania's outbreak of pediatric AIDS on contaminated blood transfusions and the constant reuse of needles at hospitals. Elsewhere in the world, most children with AIDS have contracted it from their mothers while in the womb.

Disposable needles have been in short supply in Romania and foreign governments and charities are now pledging to send several million disposable hypodermic syringes.

Enachescu said that because of Ceausescu's ban on contraception, there are 14,000 abandoned children in Romania. Many were given small blood transfusions to treat malnourishment, and the transfusions proved to be a main source of passing on the AIDS virus, he said.

Emachescu said the Health ministry had only halted such transfusions on Jan. 5.

But he said that in some orphanages and hospitals in Bucharest, the Black Sea port Constanza and the Danube port of Giurgi "there is between 15 and 50 percent" of children who have the AIDS virus.

Other towns have reported no cases and a nationwide survey must be conducted for a more complete picture of the epidemic, Enachescu said.

Dr. Jacques Lebas, president of the Paris-based humanitarian organization, Doctors of the World, said Monday that the outbreak was the first known AIDS epidemic to involve mainly children and that an initial screening of 1,025 children up to 3 years old in several hospitals and orphanages found 367 with the HIV virus.

AIDS, or acquired immune deficiency syndrome, attacks the body's immune system, leaving victims susceptible to a wide variety of infections and cancers. A person can carry the HIV virus for years without having AIDS, but in almost all cases it leads to the disease.

Roussell reinstated

BERMA, Ala. (AP) — Public schools were ordered closed for a second day today as a racial dispute flared over white management of the mostly black school system in this 1960s battleground of the civil rights movement.

On Wednesday, about 500 people chanting "soul power" and "I am somebody" marched on City hall in support of Norward Roussell, Selma's first black superintendent. The white-dominated school board dismissed Roussell from his $80,000-a-year job last week, but reinstated him amid protests, and he returned to the job Wednesday.

The six white members of the 11-member school board cited an evaluation critical of Roussell's managerial skills as the basis for dismissing him.

Protest leaders said Roussell was being fired only because he is black.

Civil rights legislation unveiled to recoup losses

Hearings set in both the House and Senate

WASHINGTON (AP) — Lawmakers of both parties joined by the head of the Episcopal Church and Coretta Scott King unveiled civil rights legislation designed to reverse recent Supreme Court rulings and help minorities and women fight job bias.

"Recent decisions of the court have reopened old wounds suffered in battles fought long ago," Mrs. King told a news conference. Supporters called the measure the major civil rights bill now before Congress.

The bill launches a counter attack by congressional liberals and civil rights activists against a series of Supreme Court rulings last year. A newly solidified conservative court majority limited affirmative action and narrowed the scope of anti-bias laws. Hearings in both the House and the Senate are set to begin within days.

Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass, said approval at the committee level might be possible within three months. The Bush admini- stration has been saying there is no urgent need for the legislation. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh has said forecasts of dire problems involving job bias represent an over reaction to the court's rulings.

Thornburgh has promised that the Justice Department will monitor the effect of the rulings to determine if legislation is needed. Kennedy said that last year the Supreme Court "issued a series of rulings that mark an abrupt and unfortunate departure from its historic vigilance in protecting civil rights."

"The fabric of justice has been torn," Kennedy said.

Rep. Augustus Hawkins, D-Calif., expressed hope that President Bush would end up signing the measure. I would say it would be very difficult for him to veto his bill," Hawkins said.

Sen. Jim Jeffords, R-Vt., urged GOP lawmakers to support the legislation. He said the Supreme Court is "closing the door" on civil rights at a time "when prison doors in South Africa are swinging open."

"I am ashamed and I am embarrassed," Jeffords said.

The Rev. Edmond L. Browning, presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church, told the news conference that "our nation's highest court - heirs of a legacy of doing justice - turned their back on our nation's historical precendents and the important lessons of our civil rights history and did grave and severe damage."

The bill:

Bar harassment or firing of employees based on racial bias. The court invalidated a lawsuit brought by a North Carolina credit union worker, Brenda Patterson, who claimed that she had been the victim of racial harassment on the job. The high court said Ms. Patterson could not use an 1966 law to press her claim, ruling the statute barred only hiring discrimination, not harassment once a person was on the job.

Force employers to show that any practice with proven discriminatory impact was prompted by business necessity. The court ruled that the burden of proof belongs with workers who allege they are the victims of bias.

Make clear that it is always illegal to use race, ethnicity, gender or religion as a motivating factor in employment decisions. The court ruled that employers have a burden of proving they did not discriminate illegally when there is evidence that bias played a part in personnel decisions, but the ruling was vague enough to confuse lower courts.

Make more permanent court approved affirmative action plans designed to remedy discrimination. The court made it easier for white men to challenge such plans years after they are put into effect.

Ease the deadlines for workers' who sue over allegedly biased seniority systems. The court ruled that the time frame for filing such lawsuits is determined by when a seniority plan is adopted, not when an individual worker is affected.

Bush tours SDI laboratory

Star Wars 'makes more sense than ever'

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — President Bush toured the nation's largest nuclear weapons lab Wednesday, then declared that Star Wars "makes more sense than ever."

"This purely defensive concept doesn't threaten a single person anywhere in the world," Bush said in a prepared foreign policy address to the Commonwealth Club after he toured the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in Livermore, California.

"God Forbid, if it ever had to be used, it would be used against missiles, not against people."

The president is on a three-day trip to focus attention on his proposed $292 billion Pentagon budget for fiscal 1990, which Democrats say gives too much to strategic weapons systems while closing bases.

Bush on Wednesday tempered his proposal for wholesale base closings with a vow of federal aid to help the communities and individuals affected.

The president said that laid off civilians would receive top priority for other Defense Department jobs and that the administration would help communities "develop powerful economic assets, new ways to use old bases."

Speaking in a heavily Democratic area where five military installations would be closed, Bush said: "There have been no politics in these proposals."

Bush said he welcomed recent pro-democracy developments in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, but that "we must not let impatience, born out of euphoria, jeopardize all we hope to achieve."

"We must remain in Europe as long as we are needed and wanted. ... Let us not forget that ... the Soviets still have more than 10,000 (nuclear) strategic weapons. They are modernizing them. They have deployed two new mobile ICBMs, and their spending on strategic defense is comparable to their spending on strategic offensive forces."

Aides said Bush considered adding a line to his speech congratulating Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev for his apparent success in winning party approval for his reform proposals, but decided against it.

"He has nothing to add to what he said yesterday," said White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater.

Bush said Tuesday that he found Gorbachev's proposals "especially encouraging."

Earlier, Bush was briefed on latest Star Wars technology during his tour of the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory.

While working to reduce nuclear arms, "we will settle for nothing less than the highest confidence in survivability, effectiveness and safety of our remaining forces," Bush told workers.

About 150 environmental and anti-nuclear activists demonstrated outside the lab during the Bush tour. It was the second consecutive day he had been met by protestors.

At A Glance

MIAMI (AP) — A federal judge refused today to give up jurisdiction in the drug trafficking case against Manuel Noriega, rejecting defense efforts to have the fallen dictator moved to a neutral country. "I don't find that under the Geneva Convention I must divest myself of jurisdiction," said U.S. District Judge William M. Hoeveler, the trial judge.

William Bryson, U.S. deputy solicitor general, had argued the government's case that the judge does have jurisdiction. "Yes, we have agreed to treat General Noriega as a prisoner of war," Bryson said. But he said the Geneva Convention clearly authorizes Noriega's prosecution in a U.S. civilian court.

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — The first human recipient of an experimental lung-assist device, a teen-ager suffering from severe respiratory stress, died Wednesday, 40 days after the bundle of fine tubes was implanted in her chest.

Melicia Harvey, 16, of Arthur City, Texas, who had remained in critical condition, died at 5:30 am of "worsening pulmonary failure," said Tim Madden, spokesman at LDS Hospital.

The experimental IntraVascular Oxygenator, implanted during a two-hour operation Friday, functioned properly until the girl died, he said, and the hospital's government-approved implants will continue.

JOHANNESBURG (AP) — Police ired tear gas today to disperse about 2,000 Blacks who tried to protest an English cricket team touring the country in violation of an international sports boycott of South Africa. At least six people were arrested.

Later, riot police with batons broke up a second protest by about 100 black youths outside a downtown office building housing the British Consulate. The protesters were chased through the streets, even though a British diplomat had asked police to let them stay. The first confrontation occurred when police ordered demonstrators to disembark after they had boarded a mini-bus headed to the staduim.

HUNTINGTON BEACH, Calif., (AP) — Crews floated containment booms into place today to protect a wildlife preserve and beaches from a slick of more than 290,000 gallons of oil spilled from a tanker that may have gashed itself on its anchor.

The Oil-foot American Trader, fully loaded with 21 million gallons of heavy Alaskan crude, tore a 3-foot hole in a compartment Wednesday as it was mooring at an offshore-pipeline terminal 10 miles from shore, the Coast Guard said.

The spill occurred just off Huntington Beach, a city about 30 miles south of Los Angeles.

qualified for the Division III national championships for the past two seasons, graduation has taken it's toll. Top performers Eric Reifschneider, Mark Malonson, and Alan Nash have all moved on.

M.I.T. is captained by juniors Joe Fugaro and Tim Holt, while freshman Manuel Jaime of Saatelite, Mexico has been the Engineers top performer in all-around competition.

After Saturday's meet, the Minutemen will face Southern Connecticut on Tuesday, before taking to the road for their final four meets of the regular season.

"This stretch give us a chance to give some of our stronger guys a good chance to rest," Eggers said. "On Saturday, we just have to keep looking for consistency."

"I just want us to be able to go out and perform some nice clean sets," Johnson said. "Hopefully, some of the guys can go out and get 9.5's for their routines."

If the Minutemen can do that, the future will begin to look a lot brighter.

"Southern [Connecticut] has got three really good guys," junior Mitch Hall said. "After this the meets are going to get a lot tougher."

coach Russ Yarworth. "It was a close, tough meet, but we couldn't pull it off."

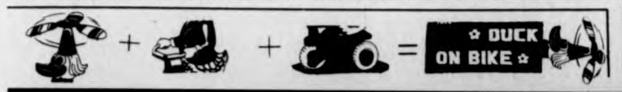
Yarworth expects a tough meet this year as well. The Terriers are a strong team, even though their record, 4-5, might not show that. Their schedule is more nationally oriented, and they have a much tougher schedule than the Minutemen. A fact their record shows. Although that does not mean that they are better than the Minutemen.

"I fully expect them to give us a difficult time, and to shave the bulk of their team for the meet as well," said Yarworth.

Coach Yarworth will also have several members of his team shave for the meet. This will give the team more speed, as well as help him decide on who to bring to the New England Championships.

Boston University will have some excellent swimmers going up against the Minutemen. Scott Reewild, who is one of the best swimmers in the East, probably will go head to head against Brian McIver. B.U. has another excellent sprinter in Mike Noonan, and Chris Lallor has a superb backstroke. Joel Beck should give Dan Chesnicka a run for his money on both boards.

"The thing I would really like to see is a lot of fan support," said Yarworth. "I've got 11 graduating seniors, and I'd like the fans to give them a good send off."



Men's track to head to Eastern's

Little room for error.

Thats the situation for the University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team if it intends to battle for one of the top three spots tomorrow at Orono, Maine in the Eastern Conference Championships.

"We have a solid history at Easterns," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien. "We're usually in the top three, but don't have much room for mistakes."

O'Brien feels he has twelve athletes who must finish somewhere in the top three for his squad to battle with last year's winner, Southern Connecticut University and runner-up New Hampshire.

Leading this group of twelve will be Jerome Bledsoe in the long jump, Joe Edgerton in the shot, Kevin Walters in the 60 and 200-meter dashes, and Garfield Vaughn and Steve Brown in the 400 and 500-meters

Equally as dangerous in the middle and distance events is Herb Heffner in the 1,000-meters, James Chute in the mile, Art Smith and Joe Millette in the 3,000, and Gerry Squires and Joe Livorsi in the 5,000.

That pushed the lead to 31-23 before a pair of McCoy hoops helped cut the margin to 35-29 at the break.

Hoop dujour: On Sunday afternooon, Temple University comes to the Cage for a 4:30 p.m. game, which can be seen on SportsChannel.

The Minutemen have never beaten the Owls in 16 tries. One of their best efforts came at McGonigle hall on Jan. 20, when UMass led by 11 points early in the second half, only to ultimately fall, 86-69.

- The McCoy watch is on. Through last night's game, he has 984 career points and needs 16 to become the first-ever UMass player to reach 1000 points as a sophomore.
- For those of you who don't have access to cable, you still have a chance to catch the Temple game. A limited number of tickets will go on sale at the Curry Hicks ticket window beginning at 2:30 Sunday afternoon. Tickets will be $6 a piece.
- The athletic department and WHMP radio will be sponsoring a face painting contest during the Temple game. Students will be judged as they enter the building so faces must be painted prior to admission in order to qualify. Two winners will each receive tickets to a Boston Celtics game.

Minutemen fall just short on the road, again

Cary Herer and the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team fell to Rutgers last night, 66-61.

Bow to Rutgers in closing seconds, 66-61

PISCATAWAY, N.J. – You have to figure that some day, they are going to win one of these.

In the last five road games, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team has at some point been in a good position to steal a win. But luck has never been on its side in the waning moments.

Last night, the Minutemen fought right to the bitter end against Rutgers University at the Louis Brown Athletic Center, but to no avail. The Scarlet Knights (12-11, 8-3 in the Atlantic 10 Conference) hung on for dear life in their own building and pulled out a 66-61 win.

"Rutgers has juniors and seniors out there in front of a home crowd and we're freshmen and sophomores on the road," UMass coach John Calipari said. "In a tight game that helps them. But I'm proud of my kids. I wouldn't trade them for any team, except maybe Kansas."

The Minutemen (12-9, 7-5 in the A-10) were within one point twice in the final minute. After a pair of Rick Dadika free throws, and Rutgers leading 62-59 with 28 ticks left, UMass went for the tie but Rafer Giles' long three-point try missed.

Rutgers forwad Keith Hughes, silent throughout most of the game, hit four key free-throws in the last 12 seconds to ice the victory. Hughes finished with a team high 15 points.

Nonetheless, it was a game that was much too close for Rutgers coach Bob Wenzel and his team.

"They are a very tough team," Wenzel said. "They're hard to guard and they did a good job atttacking our zones. The problem was [sophomore guard Jim] McCoy could get his shot any time he wanted.

McCoy had a game high 24 points for UMass but had very little help. Only sophomore forward William Herndon reached double figures, finishing with 13.

After leading at the half 35-29, Rutgers bumped it back up to eight before the Minutemen mounted a comeback to take the lead. UMass matched its biggest lead of the game at five, 48-43 with just over nine minutes to go.

Rutgers, playing without point guard Earl Duncan bounced right back however. The Minutemen were able to tie it twice but could never forge into the lead again.

The start looked like vintage Wimbledon action, as the two teams volleyed back and forth. UMass opened the scoring and, with the score tied at 10-10, was finally able to grab a decent lead as McCoy drove for a hoop and then Rafer Giles buried a wide open trey from the top of the key.

But that was quickly erased as gunner Dadika nailed a three of his own and Anthony Duckett converted a tip-in to bring back the seasick feeling.

The Knights grabbed their first lead with nine minutes left in the half when Mike Jones' three-point play made it 20-17.

Rutgers was able to stretch that lead thanks to a foul on Herndon and an ensuing skirmish which lead to matching technicals. The Knights converted four straight freebies while McCoy missed a pair as the RAC Pact started to really make some noise.

"I won't comment on it," Calipari said about the altercation. "All I know is it was a six-point swing and that was one of the key differences."

UMass drops heartbreaker at the Cage

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

After a game like this one, University of Massachusetts women's basketball coach Kathy Hewelt has got to be wondering what her team has to do to get a victory these days. Last night after getting a career high 33 points from center Helen Freeman and watching her team come back from a 16 point deficit in the second half to take a 71-70 lead with 10 seconds left (on a Sue Serafini lay in), she had to endure a running 15 foot jump shot by George Washington's Karin Vadelund to give UMass (3-17, 1-11) its eighth straight loss, 72-71.

"A true prayer," is all Hewelt could say about the last second shot by Vadelund.

"We practice that shot every night," laughed GW coach Joe McKeown. "We wanted to get the ball to Karin to see if she could drive and get a foul."

The shot put an end to a ferocious second half rush by the Minutewomen, one in which all the observers in The Cage got to see what can happen when everyone plays well. Ahead at the half 34-24, the Colonial Women (11-8,6-6) relied on Tanya Starke and Cortella Jones to add to the lead. A Starke basket with just over 10 minutes to go gave GW its largest lead of the game, 50-34.

Then Serafini, Freeman and Robak went to work. At the 5:57 mark Umass had cut the lead to nine points on a Serafini hoop at 58-49. During this 15-8 run the Minutewomen Freeman toasted the GW defense for 8 points.

"She played a great game tonight," said Hewelt in a bit of an understatement. "That's the best she's played since I've been here."

GW appeared poised to put the game out of reach when Vadelund drove the lane, took a whack from Serafini and converted a three point play to put the Colonial Women up 65-51 with just 4:41 remaining.

After a UMass time out Serafini (16 points, 2-3 3-pointers) banged home a trey, Patty Robak (11 points in an impressive outing) hit a short jumper and Freeman hit 2 free throws. At the 3:08 mark the Minutewomen were down just seven, 65-58. Another 6-0 run, again capped off by two free throws from Freeman, cut the GW lead to just three points, 68-65 with just over a minute left.

GW's Anne Riley missed a forced jumper and then fouled Serafini on the defensive end. Serafini hit both ends of the pressure packed one-and-one to cut the lead to a single point, 68-67.

Vadelund (16 points while playing the entire game) missed a one-and-one and UMass rebounded and called time with 44 seconds left. When play resumed Robak spotted up in the left corner and made a beautiful inside feed to a posted up Freeman who got fouled on the attempt. Once more she hit both free throws (she was 15-18 from the line) to give UMass its first lead of the night, 69-68.

On the ensuing trip down the floor Robak came out overly aggressive on freshman sensation ("She's the best freshman in the league," said McKeown) Jen Shasky (15 points.) She converted both ends of the bonus and UMass called its final time out with the score 70-69. Just 10 seconds remained.

With everyone in The Cage thinking the rock would end up in Freeman's hands, Serafini cut to the hoop and scored on a lay up to make it 71-69 UMass. The rest is history.

Swimmers to host Terriers

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming team closes out the regular season tomorrow with a dual meet against the Boston University Terriers. The meet is slated for a 1 p.m. start and will be the final meet at UMass this season.

The Minutemen are looking to improve their record to 11-0 and end the regular season on a perfect note. But the Minutemen don't expect this to be a cake walk. In fact, this will probably be their toughest outing yet. The last dual meet that the Minutemen lost was to the Terriers last season.

"Last year, they came into the meet shaved, and we didn't," said UMass

UMass gymnastics teams jump into action tomorrow

• Men entertain MIT tomorrow

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Although the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team is in the soft part of it's schedule, there's plenty for the 3-3 Minutemen to work on to avoid getting stuck in the mud before they return to hard ground later in the season.

Improving individual routines will be high on the UMass' list when they take on Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Saturday at 1 p.m. at the Boyden Gymnastics Center. Although M.I.T. has struggled to an 0-4 record, UMass coach Roy Johnson sees the meet as an important opportunity for his team.

"In a meet like this, guys have the opportunity to go all out for certain routines," Johnson said. "If they shoot the moon to try to get their best routine, and don't let the meet they're in enter the picture, they should realize that they can do that in bigger meets too."

Johnson cited an example from Wednesday's 224.05-152.15 win over Dartmouth to illustrate his point. "In that meet, (senior) John Eggers really got up for his still rings routine, and he ended up scoring a 9.3," Johnson said.

The current portion of the schedule also gives some new faces an opportunity to step into the spotlight.

"Against Dartmouth, it was a great experience for (freshman) Rob Thomas to compete as an all-arounder," Johnson said. "This allows him to realize that with a little hard work, he'll be able to get in all-around for the bigger meets."

How does a team prepare for a meet against a struggling opponent?

"I think it's tough for the guys to get psyched up," Johnson said. "I just tell them to try a few new things and to have some fun — a lot of the same things we tell then anyway."

"We have to work on two key areas — pommel horse and high bar," Johnson added. "Having (junior) Dave Dinucci out last meet hurt us — he's usually a consistent performer in those two events." Dinucci is out with a hip flexor problem, and Johnson expects to have him back for next Tuesday's meet against Southern Connecticut.

UMass beat M.I.T. by a score of 243.6-193.4 last season, with senior co-captain Eggers scoring a 52.9 in all-around competition. Although the Engineers

• Women travel to Bridgeport

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Three different divisions will be competing head to head this Saturday as the University of Massachusetts' women's gymnastics team (3-2, 1-0 in the Atlantic-10 Conference) travels to Bridgeport, Conn.to take on Division II University of Bridgeport and Division III Rhode Island Colleg.

The Minutewomen will look to raise their performance level another notch to keep up with Bridgeport's better than average scoring as of late. Also, watch out for the Purple Knights' all-arounder Maurine Lagura, who's individual average 36.6 betters the Minutewomen's Tammy Marshall's average of 36.46.

"We definitely want to get in the 180's this week," UMass coach Alfie Mitchell said. "We want to score high at this meet and at next week's in order to drop last week's 178."

Rhode Island college, knowing their up against more competitive teams, will have the opportunity to improve their scores, allowing them a shot at their own divisional regionals, but they shouldn't be a problem for the Minutewomen.

"Rhode Island hasn't been scoring well this season," Mitchell said. "Going against better teams might help them raise their team score. It should be an interesting meet."

Mitchell, remaining with his starting five all-arounders, has made a few minor changes in the line-up. Lisa-Beth Cronen will be going back to her usual first position on the vault and will be an alternate for balance beam. Jennifer Perry will make her debut on the balanace beam while Carrie Pierce will be an alternate in the floor exercise.

"The all-arounders have to hit all four of their events," Mitchell said. "If they do, our future looks bright but we can't wait much longer to show what we're capable of."

Mitchell hopes last week's low team score will fuel the Minutewomen's desire to improve this week. After this weekend, UMass heads into the more difficult part of their schedule, starting next weekend at home with New Hampshire.

"I'd like to remain in the top five of the Northeast to have a good shot at the regionals," Mitchell said. "I know we'll send individuals to the regionals but we want to be their as a team and to do that we have to get into sync."

Mandela watches her father set free

By the Associated Press

Around 9:15 a.m. yesterday, Makaziwe Mandela-Amuah's living room erupted into yells, tears and fists punching the air in salute as South Africa's most famous prisoner walked free.

"When I saw him walk there, oh, I was just so excited. To see him walk out tall in a dignified way, it's just so wonderful to look at him," said Nelson Mandela's daughter.

"It's an experience that will live for me forever. I was really elated, overjoyed, happy. I really can't express it. It was my father, seeing my father." The 36 year-old anthropologist studying as a Fulbright Scholar at the University of Massachusetts spoke in her apartment that bristled with television equipment set up to catch the long distance sighting between the woman and the father who has been in prison since she was 8 years old.

Although the 71 year-old Mandela's release has been rumored for months, nothing compared to actually seeing "the father that I have never had. I see him there and I see the possibility for me to be reunited," she said.

"It's just so inspiring to me. I really never expected this moment, this day to come about," she said.

Mandela-Amuah plans to return home this summer when she hopes to start getting to know her father. Until then, she will stay in Amherst where she lives with her three children and husband, Isaac, who is also a doctoral student at UMass.

While she was thrilled at the release, Mandela-Amuah said she does worry for her father's safety. She is also concerned about the intense scrutiny he will face as he begins dealing with the down to earth reality of being a black leader after 27 years as being a symbolic figure. And, she said, she hopes Americans won't interpret her father's release as the end to South African blacks' struggle for equality.

"This is only the first step, a little step, and we should not forget this," she said. "The battle is not over. It's only starting at a renewed, higher level."

In Boston, Patrick Lekota, publicity secretary for the Students stopped in primary

Crawford and Smith eliminated in local Select Board elections

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

Robb Smith and Brian Crawford's bids to become the first students elected to the Amherst Select Board ended last Friday.

At the town primary, the two University of Massachusetts seniors finished at the back of the pack of six candidates, which eliminates their names from the final ballot.

The top four finishers in the primary were: H. Olman Brooks, a management specialist for Spaulding Sports Worldwide; Carolyn Holstein, a social psychology researcher; David Keenan, a real estate developer; and Richard Gold, a retired UMass psychology professor.

The four remaining candidates will square off for the two vacant Select Board seats in a townwide election on March 13.

According to the Amherst Town Clerk's office, 1,984 out of 12, 752 registered voters, or about 15 percent went to the polls.

Town Clerk Cornelia Como called the voter turnout "about average" and said the student turnout was especially low.

"The student vote is always low," she said. "We had heard there would be busloads of students to vote but I guess that never happened."

Based on the final vote tally, Crawford estimated that 150 students voted in the primary.

In an effort to boost support for their candidacies, Crawford and Smith implemented many strategies ranging from canvassing voters in the dorms to carpooling student voters to the polls.

On the day of the primary, Crawford and Smith issued a last minute plea in a Collegian column urging the student community to exercise their right to vote.

"Students have talked about mobilizing and running candidates for office since the onslaught of the budget cuts toward higher education and social services began two years ago," they wrote. "Since then we have registered thousands of students and now its time to take our rightful place in government. Registering only works if you vote."

The ousted candidates cited several possible reasons why students failed to vote in significant numbers. One major factor, Crawford said, was the timing of the primary. The town deadline to register to vote for the primary was in the third week of January, a time when most students were out of town for winter vacation, he said.

According to Crawford, the primary traditionally takes place in March and the election in April. A primary date only two weeks into the UMass semester allowed little time for campaigning on campus, Crawford said.

"Clearly, we didn't have time to mobilize a thousand votes," he said.

Crawford added that his estimate of the number of student registered voters was exaggerated. Half the students on his list, obtained from town records, had either moved or graduated, he said.

Last week, Crawford/Smith campaign manager Ted Chambers incorrectly estimated there were about 3,000 registered student voters in Amherst.

Contrary to the town clerk's opinion of voter turnout for the primary, Smith said the turnout was high. Citing town voting records, he said 800 votes is usually enough to win a general election, never mind a primary. He said the fact that two candidates netted more than 1,000 votes each shows that many residents are scared by thoughts of students in public office.

"We got the vote out," he said. "Unfortunately, it was the wrong vote."

African students hold vigil for Mandela

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Sekhulumi Ntsoale was nine years old when African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela was sentenced to life imprisonment in South Africa.

Yesterday morning, Ntosoale and friends watched from their television in Amherst and clenched their fists in salute to the ANC leader as they watched him walk out of the jail a free man, twenty-seven years later.

Ntsoale and a group of about a dozen five college South African students held a vigil at Ntsoale's apartment for Mandela throughout Saturday night until his release at 8 a.m. on Sunday.

Ntsoale, a senior at the University of Massachusetts as well as a member of the ANC said, "I wish I could be home and in Africa and rejoicing with them."

The South African students at the vigil celebrated the event, but they realized this is only the beginning of the struggle, according to Ntsoale.

"Freedom for Mandela does not mean freedom from oppression," Ntsoale said. "We still have a long way to go."

UMass graduate student, Menzi Mthwecu said he feels like a human being for the first time in South Africa.

"Mandela is another word for freedom to all South Africans," Mthwecu said. "I think there will be

As negotiations between the Graduate Employee Organization and University of Massachusetts administrators continue, graduate student groups are planning to step up actions against the University.

Tomorrow at 2 p.m. graduate students from the Department of Public Health are scheduled to march from Arnold House to Whitmore Aministration building. They will meet with Susan Pearson, director of Academic Administration, and the University's representative at the negotiations.

The GEO membership is scheduled to vote Wednesday either for the contract offered by the University or for a job action, possibly a strike.

The planned action is the latest in a string of strategies attempted by the GEO membership to garner support. Only the Board of Regents, which oversees the state's higher education system, can award GEO collective bargaining power, but GEO members say the administration's support would bolster their efforts.

On Friday, a group of about 20 English and philosophy graduate students marched from Bartlett Hall to Chancellor Duffey's office in the Whitmore Administration Building to deliver a petition supporting the GEO's unionization effort.

As the group marched down the hall to Duffey's office, chanting "TA's and RA's will never be defeated," the chancellor's staff quickly locked the doors, shutting the protesters out.

A secretary to the chancellor said this action is standard procedure in reaction to unknown groups coming down the hall. She said Duffey had already left for the day on a trip to Washington, D.C.

Unable to enter the office, the students addressed a large, blown-up "While You Were Out" message to Duffey and posted it on his office doors. The students then

Mandela finally freed after 27 years as political prisoner

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) — Nelson Mandela walked through a prison gate to freedom Sunday, setting off joyous celebrations and violent clashes as blacks nationwide welcomed their leader back from 27 years in jail.

"Comrades and fellow South Africans, I greet you all in the name of peace, democracy and freedom for all," Mandela told tens of thousands of cheering supporters who thronged outside City Hall, many getting their first look at the African National Congress leader.

"I stand here before you not at as a prophet, but as a humble servant of you the people."

Within an hour of the release, as Mandela's motorcade arrived at City Hall, violence broke out. First aid workers and journalists said one person was killed and more than 100 people injured when riot police fired shotguns after groups of black youths smashed shop windows in the city center.

Some youths retaliated by hurling bottles at the officers, Hundreds of terrified people waiting to hear Mandela ran for cover as police fired blasts of shotgun pellets.

Clashes between police and celebrating blacks were reported in at least two other areas, while in Johannesburg, thousands of young blacks received an escort from traffic police as they ran triumphantly through the city. Columns of cheering activists jogged through Durban and other cities.

"We have waited too long for our freedom," Mandela told the crowd. He said that until the proper climate was created for peaceful negotiations, the armed struggle was still a policy of the ANC.

"The factors that (caused the need for armed struggle)... exist today," Mandela said. "We have no options but to continue,"

"We express the hope that a climate conducive to a negotiated settlement would be created."

Mandela spoke of "my long and lonely years in prison."

"I am content that your pain and suffering was far greater than my own," he said, adding that he would make further statements after consulting his ANC comrades.

"There must be an end to white monopoly of political power and a fundamental restructuring of our political and economic systems to ensure that the inequalities of apartheid are addressed," he said.

The ANC leader called President F.W. de Klerk a man "of integrity," and called on the white community to "join us in the safety of a new South Africa. The freedom movement is a political home for you, too."

Mandela, jailed since 1962 for helping plan the African National Congress' anti-government guerrilla campaign, was greeted by a thunderous cheer when he and his wife, Winnie, walked hand in hand through the gateway of Victor Verster prison in Paarl, 35 miles from Cape Town.

The Mandelas gave clenched-fist salutes to the hundreds of supporters who had waited for house outside, many of them waving green, gold and black ANC flags.

Mandela, dressed in a dark suit and tie, appeared solemn and dignified as he and his wife walked to a white BMW sedan and climbed in. He broke into a broad smile as the car set off slowly toward Cape Town in a police-escorted motorcade.

Scores of policemen stood guard in the bright sunshine, and a small army of photographers and television crews from across the world frenetically took the first pictures of Mandela as a free man.

CAPE TOWN, SOUTH AFRICA — Nelson Mandela waves during his first address in freedom after spending 27 years in jail.

The state-run South African Broadcasting Corp. gave live television coverage to the release.

"This is the moment the world has been waiting for,' said the television reporter at the scene. "The sun is shining on South Africa."

History offers hope after 'Glory'

BOSTON (AP) — More than a century after their ancestors fought in the Civil War battle memorialized by the current movie "Glory," the descendants of the all black 54th regiment say prejudice still thrives.

But they say their proud histories offer hope for racial harmony, even as it remains a distant dream in Boston, where the handling of black suspects in the Carol Stuart murder case has driven a wedge between the area's black and white communities.

"Sometimes I think we are going backwards," said Helen Jeffery, 78, whose great-great uncle was Sgt. Charles W. Lennox, a free black from Waltham who fought for the 54th. "There are so many incidents. There doesn't seem to be any happy medium."

Jeffery's grandfather was Samuel Roberts, who sued the city of Boston in 1865 to desegregate its schools, and won 10 years later. About a century later, Boston's blacks and whites continued to get educations that were de facto segregated, and racial fury flamed when the city came under a court busing order in the 1970's.

Jeffery, then a Statehouse clerk, remembers the taunts and jeers as if they rang around her still. "People said to me we should all go back where we came from, and this when I was born and raised here for all these years, when my great-grandchild is a seventh-generation American," Jeffery said. "That kind of hurt, when we are property owners, when we are educated," she said.

The 54th regiment, the first unit of black soldiers to fight in the Civil War, launched a famous attack on Fort Wagner, a confederate outpost in South Carolina, during which half of the Northern force was killed.

Though the assault was turned back, the performance of the soldiers under fire proved that, counter to the reigning misconception, black people would fight for the Union if given the chance.

The movie "Glory," which has received accolades since its opening last month, depicted the regiment's odyssey from a fragmented mass of free blacks and former slaves to a battle-tested, proud and cohesive unit cloaked in celebrity.

Genevieve Snowden, a grandniece of Lenox who lives in the suburb of West Roxbury, said when she was young, people did not want to talk about the days of slavery.

"People were ashamed of slavery and all that," said Snowden, 75. But today, she said, "I have one great-nephew that is trying to get all the background. He says we have a background and he wants to know about the family's roots."

Mt. Holyoke "Teaches America"

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

College campuses are usually stunningly quiet on Saturday mornings but Mount Holyoke College had a buzz of forty fifth-graders from Holyoke visiting the college as part of Teach for America, a program established to combat teacher shortages. The program, conducted simultaneously across the country at 100 colleges and universities, seeks to join college students interested in teaching with inner-city and rural area fifth graders who might not otherwise think of college for educational advancement.

Eprain Martinez, magnet school director for the Holyoke School System, said that Teach for America is important because it is early intervention with students who may drop out of school.

"Some of these kids have never been to a college and have no idea that a place like this exists," he said. "It's terribly important to expose kids to what colleges have to offer."

Martinez also said the program informs the students about how to pay for college. "There are kids in high school that are in an amazement when they learn that they too can go to college with financial aid."

Madeline Marquez, special assistant to the president of the college for education affairs, said the college supported the event because it is never too early to promote "life options" to children.

"We have a tendency to talk to children about college in abstract objects," she said. "This makes it real for them."

The students visited the college's art gallery and gym during their tour of the campus.

Although the program focuses on the children, it is geared primarily toward college students who might not normally consider teaching as an option after school, said Debra Hunter, a Mount Holyoke senior and local organizer of the event.

Neil Heffernan, a freshman computer science and history major at Amherst College, said he was interested in teaching before the program and that it has helped give him a little confidence about the profession.

"I really think I want to teach," he said. "I can't think of anything more challenging and demanding than teaching."

Investigation questions students' actions

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

The case involving four students' violations of the Student Code of conduct is officially in the Dean of Students office, said Charmaine Wijeyesinghe, assistant dean of students.

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima, Commuter Area Government board members Ted Chambers, Robb Smith, and Brian Crawford, were said to be under investigation for using Undergraduate Student Senate office phones to call voters for the Evelyn Murphy campaign, and to request voter participation in a caucus for the democratic gubenatorial campaign.

"Our office has been given most of the initial documentation regarding the case. The Dean of Students and I will be meeting through the week to determine whether we will pursue future courses of action," Wejeysinghe said.

She said Traci Davis, SGA president, Jonathan Anastas, student attorney general, and Keith Strier, assistant student attorney general, met with her on Friday afternoon. They discussed options available to those involved were discussed.

Wejeysinghe said originally it was seen as student-student conflict and the Dean of Student's responsibility was as mediator. Student leaders have sought internal resolvement, and Wejeysinghe's office has agreed.

"To this point, it has been the course of action that the Dean has encouraged students to pursue," she said.

"That decision has since changed somewhat," she said.

DOD protesters to undertake own defense

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Two individuals arrested last April on trespassing charges for protesting Department of Defense Anthrax research at the UMass campus have asked supporters of the defendants to arrive at 8:30 a.m. Tuesday before the trial begins to show their support.

Jay Allain a UMass alumnus, John Langford, a UMass graduate student, and Jonathan Leavitt, a UMass undergraduate, and Randy Viscio, a Hampshire College student will offer their defenses in a pro se trial to Judge Edward Shea Tuesday at Northampton Superior Courthouse.

"This means we will be representing ourselves. That way there is more of an opportunity to expand the courtroom structure," Allain said.

Nancy Callahan, a UMass undergraduate and Thomas Popejoy, an Amherst College undergraduate, also arrested last spring have chosen a continuance without a finding.

This means they have opted not to go through the process of a trial. They must perform 20 hours of community service, if they are not arrested within the next year and have performed the service, charges against them will be dropped.

"I'm not too optimistic about the trial. It seems that our protesting produced very little results," Langford said in a telephone interview yesterday.

The charges against these students are trespassing. Viscio is also charged with disorderly conduct.

UMass associate professor dies of cancer at age 38

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Associate Professor Mark Sayre of the Wildlife and Fisheries Department at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, nicknamed "the bear man" from his research of black bears, died on New Year's Day of pancreatic cancer at the age of 38.

Besides leaving behind a young family, Sayre had collected a significant amount of data about the effects of development on the habitats of black bears in Western Mass. and Central Vermont. Also, his teaching position has not yet been filled.

Curtice Griffin, a colleague of Sayre's, said his research on the "habitual fragmentation" of black bears' territory has helped both humans and bears to deal with interactions caused by roads and highways infiltrating large tracts of forests.

Griffin defined habitual fragmentation as "the accumulation piecemeal effects of development such as houses and roadways that fragment the habitat."

Griffin said that Sayre researched how human and bear interactions have become a problem. Griffin said Sayre documented how bears can cause economic damage to farmers, and beekeepers, and also how housing developments and roads within the bears' habitats have reduced the number of the bear population.

"We can't continue to build houses and shopping malls around them and expect them to survive."

In his courses such as Techniques of Wildlife and Fisheries Management and Radio Telemetry, Sayre brought students out with him to trap and track black bears through the D.A.R. State Forest in Goshen. Griffin said that Sayre influenced undergraduate students with an "affectious" love of nature.

"He has an intense love of wildlife and the outdoors and he exposed students to the outdoors," Griffin said. "He used a lot of students in his bear work."

Griffin said that Dean Albertyson had recently authorized a search for Sayre's replacement. For this semester, Radio Telemetry and Techniques have been canceled. Dr. John Organ of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is teaching one of Sayre's courses this semester, Principles of Wildlife Management.

Dr. Rebecca Field of the Massachusetts Cooperative Fish and Wildlife Research Unit at UMass is continuing Sayre's bear research. Griffin said that field administrates between the Research Unit, the state, the university, and the U.S. Wildlife Department.

The Department of Wildlife and Fisheries Biology has established a trust fund for Sayre's three young children. Also, memorial contributions can be made to the American Cancer Society in Holyoke.

Safe sex valentines say "I love you"

By CHRISTINE BIELAK
Collegian Correspondent

The Peer Sexuality Program (PSP) and the Peer Health Promotion Program (PHPP) at the University of Massachusetts launched their third annual Valentine's Day Condom and Dental Dam Gram sale last week.

Gretchen Krull, the coordinator of PSP, said the intent of the Grams, which can be bought or sent, is to promote safe sex practices and not to insult the recipient. Each Gram consists of a card with a condom or dental dam and instructions for use inside.

Krull and Rita Hirsch, the program coordinator of PHPP, said their goal is to reach out to the UMass campus through safe sex education.

Krull said there is a problem of comfort when dealing with the topic of safe sex. She added the idea of practicing safe sex is widely known but many students feel awkward purchasing condoms.

Booth staffer, Alison Hart Smith, said that more women than men sent the Grams. "They walk by a few times before they come up. There's lots of joking," staff member Maribel Ortiz said."They wonder what their friends reactions will be."

Another staffer said, "A lot [of people] just want to know what it is."

The PSP holds workshops, courses, and other activities throughout the year. Last year, 55 workshops were offered on sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) and other related concerns.

The PSP runs a theater group, called "The Not Ready for Bedroom Players." The student group addresses such issues as sexuality, safe sex practices, and STDs. The PHPP runs workshops on issues such as eating disorders and stress management.

Grams can be purchased at the booth in the Campus Center on Feb. 12 and 13. They will be hand delivered to campus addresses by Feb. 14, or can be mailed off campus. Dam Grams will be available upon request.

signed the message and posted the petitions to the doors.

Susan Buechler, an English graduate student and GEO coordinating committee member, said the march was intended as an "informational action."

GEO has been seeking three demands from the University:
recognition as a union affiliated with District 65/United Auto Workers, recession of the $400 curriculum fee levied this semester and assurance that the University will employ the same number of graduate student employees this semester as last fall.

DA stresses awareness of racism

By MORGAN BITTON
Collegian Correspondent

Northwestern District Attorney Judd Carhart stressed the importance of "consciousness raising throughout the valley" in terms of racism and civil rights at a meeting Thursday of the Amherst Democratic Town Committee.

At the meeting, the widely publicized Hatfield incident — in which the town's Board of Health Chairman Thomas Hart was quoted as saying racist remarks — was cited as evidence of existing problems and issues surrounding racism.

"We do have a problem in the Valley," Carhart said.

The district attorney's office enforces the law but it is often difficult to apply civil rights laws to "subtle racism" Carhart said. Derogatory remarks are not grounds for law action, he said.

"Complaints come in almost every day, but we can't do anything if no crime has been committed," Carhart said.

Carhart met with the committee as a precursor to a forum scheduled for 3 p.m. Friday at the Northampton Hilton Inn to discuss the increase of racist activity in the region and the desire of many community groups to come together and seek solutions to the problem.

The event, titled, "Building a multicultural community, confronting our prejudices and appreciating our differences," will draw together community groups, and elected and appointed officials.

Featured at the event will be civil rights expert Sally Greenberg of the Anti-Defamation League in Boston, Dr. Bailey Jackson, assistant dean of the School of Education at the University of Massachusetts, Frederick Hurst of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination and Kevin Kafguard, activist and attorney for gay rights.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Morning people. It's Monday again. Have I ever mentioned that I think all Mondays ought to be canceled due to lack of interest?

Last week when I wrote that I thought Mikhail Gorbachev would give into the demands of the people of the Soviet Union, I didn't ever think that the communist party would give up its legalized monopoly on power.

Just goes to show that political movements can snowball, and start rolling damn fast.

The cry of freedom is once again being heard in South Africa (not that anyone ever stopped shouting). People are taking to the streets in thousands to demand freedom from a minuscule minority with power.

I think the white minority better wake up and start moving quickly. Maybe we should send them all copies of U.S. history books and highlight the sections on General Custer.

What is going on with these oil tanker spills? This is getting to be as bad as those "accidents" in the aviation industry.

Don't get me wrong, I think that Manuel Noriega is a crook and all that, but. . . invading another country to arrest someone on criminal charges in our country seems a little fuzzy to me.

Peter Leon

. . . well, ok, it was plain wrong. I think he'll never stand trial in Federal Court, thus saving the CIA from having to admit their involvement with drug running.

How do I know the CIA is drug running? Well, they do have a history of doing so. (Remember Vietnam?) So hedging my bets, I would say that our government has been supporting Noriega. He wanted something we wouldn't give and so he held out on us, causing that incursion.

George Bush is doing the Ron Reagan, claiming we still need SDI. He's right we do. But there is a glitch. Every intelligent and respected physicist and other science type in the country has said it won't work. Back to the drawing board, George.

The stuff going on in the Undergraduate Senate about how Robb Smith, Ted Chambers and Erik Nakajima misused capital equipment pisses me off.

Since when does the Senate have ethics? Why should they scream about misuses of capital equipment when they have procured too much capital equipment? Did you know we have a lovely laser printer, which cost $2500? Why? I don't know, ask SGA communications. They might claim it has been used for the other campus newspapers. But wait, aren't all of them basically politically slanted journals? I don't know, I'm getting confused.

Quote of the week: In reference to the Pentagon, former Senator Dan Quayle talked about the inefficiency and corruption in Pentagon weapons buying.

He said "In the past we have tried too much to prevent the making of mistakes."

Thus till next week, people, keep the faith.

Jeopardy know-it-alls

Now, I realize that one's career, lifestyle or education has no bearing on the amounts of trivial information they store in their heads and spout off at parties to impress others.

Alise Harfield

Some people, it would seem, are further bent on remembering where the London Bridge is nowadays, or what the 18th decimal point of Pi is.

Further, logic would say that a graduating senior from an accredited institution such as UMass doesn't HAVE to know every three letter word beginning with "M" to survive.

Such a person has a mind open to more important things than trivia.

Point is, we should no longer be afraid of confronting or even joining a social gathering of Jeopardy for fear of losing horribly to friends, being the brunt of their You don't know the square root of every whole number from one to a thousand jokes or even tuning in by ourselves and venting anger at Alex Trebek for knowing (it would seem) every answer's question.

Because, I have discovered, Trebek is NOT the beacon of knowledge. His contestants are hardly pillars of correct information.

They do what we have all done in the past to get by in life: they memorize.

Here's what I mean.

This is what must happen pregame:

ALEX: Okay. Did we all write down who we want to be today?

3 CONTESTANTS (in unison): What is yes?

–1: I'll be the Professor Emeritus of Psychobiology and Aerospace Engineering from Stanford.

–2: I'll be the Citibanker who lives near Donald Trump.

–3 (heavy sigh): I guess I'll have to be the cop from the Bronx. . .

ALEX: Okay, everyone call out the categories you memorized.

–1: Okay, I know by heart, what is mu, what is an octave, and what is feline.

ALEX: Then be sure to pick "Greek Alphabets," "Music," and "Animals." Number 2?

–2: Hey, I wanted music. I studied all those answers!

–3: Shut up! You get to be the returning champion. What else do you want?

ALEX: Please! Please! It's nearly air time. Look over the answers one more time. Check to be sure you press your button is in the right place. Oh, and be sure not to say, I'll take answers we memorized before the show for 800, please on the air, okay guys?

–2: What is okay? I mean, okay, Alex! Just practicing! Ha, ha.

–3: Hey Trebek, relax. I'm sick of your attitude when we forget a question: Oh, noooo. The capital of Kentucky isn't Frankfurter. Like you know!! You're as dumb as the rest of us, Alex. All you have to do is read the answer off the card, or glance at the teleprompter. We have to memorize before every show! This game show is a fraud! We've given so many people inferiority complexes, and promoted many living room brawls. I'm sick of pretending to know everything all the time!

ALEX: Well, it's too late to forfeit. Besides, it's your turn to win tonight. We can't afford to keep Mr. Citibanker the champion anymore.

–3: Well, okay. As long as I get to win tonight. . .

After 27 years of imprisonment, Nelson Mandela was released from Victor Verster Prison north of Capetown this weekend. He has been a symbol of hope to many South Africans. And a threat to others.

How does this make you feel?

How will Mandela's release affect apartheid? Where do you think interracial relations will go? What should the role of the U.S. be?

The Editorial Desk will be running a Point/Counterpoint page this Friday, Feb.16 on Mandela's release. Submissions must be received by Thursday, Feb.15 at 1 p.m.

Send all submissions to the Editorial Desk, 113 Campus Center, c/o Minu Sebastian.

How about writing a column or drawing a cartoon?

The Editorial Desk is looking for people who are interested in becoming cartoonists and columnists.

Come down to the Collegian offices, 113 Campus Center, and ask for Minu, Gayle, Reggie or Josh for more details.

We would appreciate your input!

Quote of the day

"Sit down before fact as a little child, be prepared to give up every preconceived notion, follow humbly wherever and to whatever abyss nature leads, or you shall learn nothing."

— Thomas Huxley

" IT'S MY PARTY AND I'LL CRY IF I WANT TO!..."

Pay for what we take

Imagine you're in the University Store.

You're quietly going about your business when you notice someone next to you with an armful of merchandise.

He's got a couple of CDs, a poster, a UMass shot glass, the works.

Greg Sukiennik

He looks around quickly and starts heading out the door, past the checkout counters.

"Hey," says the clerk. "You didn't pay for those!"

"I don't have to," replies the man. "And who are you to demand I give you my hard-earned money?"

Now, imagine you live in Massachusetts.

You've just enrolled at UMass, and you notice that prices are going up. You also notice that citizens around you are using state roads, are being protected by police and firefighters paid for by state aid and are sending their kids to state-funded public schools.

But they won't pay higher taxes to pay for any of these things.

"Hey!" say the working class people of Massachusetts. "You didn't pay for that!"

"I don't have to," reply these other citizens. "And who are you to demand I fork over my hard-earned money?"

These are two different circumstances, but the same concept applies.

A concept that folks like Barbara Anderson of Citizens for Limited Taxation don't seem to understand.

Let me clarify things here. Until Monopoly money is legal tender in Massachusetts (now there's an idea!), the services we take for granted that the state provides are not free.

To make matters even worse, the state has run up a $500 million deficit.

Yes, the state should cut back as far as possible, especially in the areas of paid consultants, waste and bureaucracy.

But would this save $500 million? Common sense says that's not likely. So, who else gets cut?

Police, firefighters, schools, state employees (the kind who work, not cushy desk job types) — in short, the "guts" of what makes this state run.

These kinds of cuts should be avoided. So, where should the money come from?

Taxes. Gasp! I said a bad word.

Unfortunately, the free-ride mentality of this state won't let any tax hike take effect, even in conjunction with the kind of cuts that should be made.

Apparently, folks like the shoplifter in the first scenario and Citizens for Limited Taxation feel that the state owes them free services.

Am I comparing Citizens for Limited Taxation with common shoplifters? You better believe it.

Perhaps it's a harsh assessment. But as a state resident who's responsible enough to pay taxes, I regard no-new-taxes rhetoric as an insult to those of us who are willing to pay for what we take.

A moderate, progressive tax hike, coupled with prudent budget cuts, is the only solution to Massachusetts' fiscal woes.

Anything else is fiscal suicide and irresponsible government policy.

Greg Sukiennik is a UMass student.

United Democratic Front and a former political prisoner who was jailed with Mandela, said he had mixed feelings watching the release.

"In a way I was relieved. His release will bring stability to the movement and strengthen it," Lekota said. "But as I watched him walk down the road, surrounded by police, I had a sudden fear that anything could happen."

Lekota said many in the South African police forces are members of the country's conservative political party, which violently opposed Mandela's release and the aims of the anti-apartheid movement.

"Security is crucial at this point," Lekota said. "It's not impossible that there will be attempts on his life."

Lekota said the next steps for the anti-apartheid movement are to gain the release of other political prisoners and to begin negotiations to form a new constitution for the country.

Mandela, Lekota said, would meet with members of the movement to map out coming plans for the apartheid resistance.

"Nelson is not an individualist. He's a teamworker. He will meet with the movement to decide what the next steps are," Lekota said.

ARTS & LIVING

New World Theater celebrates the many talents of Paul Robeson:

By ANTONIA MAGUIRE
Collegian Correspondent

The first of a series of multicultural performances comes to the Fine Arts Center this week, in celebration of Black History Month. Robeson! will be performed by Don Oliver of the Theaterworks company on Wednesday, Feb. 14.

Comprised of songs, stories and a history of the life of singer, actor, athlete and activist Paul Robeson, the play promises to be an exciting example of documentation and education through the medium of entertainment.

As an actor, Paul Robeson is probably best remembered for his portrayal of Othello, both in England and America, during the 1930s and early 1940s. It was for this role that critics said he was "transcending racial boundaries with his dark, black velvet voice." His contribution to American theater is profound in that he and Charles Gilpin were the first Black tragedians to reach such high acclaim since the death of Ira Aldrich in 1867. The song "Ole Man River," from the musical Show Boat was written especially for Robeson.

As a contribution to Black History Month, however, this show is likely to take up the theme of Paul Robeson in his role of champion of freedom of the oppressed. Through the high acclaim he achieved as a singer and actor, Robeson was able to speak out in defense of the oppressed, from the Jews in Nazi Germany to the copper miners of Utah, to his fellow Blacks in America.

Robeson was born in 1898, the son of a New Jersey minister who had been a slave. During his career, he performed in Germany, Spain, Russia and England, where he lived and worked for many years.

In Africa he fought for the independence of many African nations — the worldwide acclaim and respect for the man was, and still is, indescribable.

However, at the height of his career as an actor and singer and at the height of his work as an activist, the State Department took away his passport. For eight years, Robeson was forbidden to leave America. He died in 1976.

Co-sponsored by the New World Theater and the Fine Arts Center, Robeson! should mark the start of an exciting semester for multicultural theater at UMass, as well as a celebration for Black History Month. Tickets for the performance on Wednesday, Feb. 14. are on sale at the Fine Arts Center Box Office for $3

Club Med, or how to fulfill your mental potential

By KARI J. BODNARCHUK
Collegian Correspondent

Meditation, like soccer, running, biking or any other sport, is an activity which requires consistency if you want to excel in it and benefit. Like sports, it requires conditioning.

But with meditation, you must condition the mind as well as the body.

However, unlike other sports, you don't have to be in excellent physical shape to participate, have the spineless flexibility of Olympic gymnast Olga Korbut or be expected to pay any enormous athletic fees. Additionally, no equipment is required, except a body, mind and will.

Mike Bushe, a senior psychology major at UMass, has been meditating for three years (twice a day) and holding meditation classes on campus for the past three semesters. The classes, which usually draw about 40 people, are aimed at reducing stress, increasing your mental potential and, among other things, exploring your inner self.

To obtain these goals, meditators are not expected to perform contortionist acts of any sort. The most strenuous maneuver that participants are required to do is the Kiirtan, a dance which involves movement of the body that also affects the mind. When performing the Kiirtan, you simply put your arms up in the air and tap one toe on the back of the opposite foot, while chanting.

Bushe also teaches yoga exercises, or "innercises," which derive from "asanas," an Indian word which literally means "position held comfortably."

But meditation goes much beyond simplistic body movements and deep into the layers, or "kosas," of the mind. Through the act of meditation, individuals are able to penetrate the lower levels — the conscious and subconscious — of their mind, with the aim of reaching a state of perfect peace — located in the realm of the "spirit" or infinite consciousness.

The process of meditation involves deep relaxation or "creative diatribe," according to Bushe, in which you "let everything go."

"The first step is to clear away all the mental baggage which has accumulated in your conscious mind that you are not aware of," he says. "The individual is then able to delve deeper into and expand the mind where he/she can find peace, bliss and love."

The most important thing to focus on, Bushe says, is the glandular system, which is intimately connected to a person's mental state. Since the endocrine glands secrete hormones into the bloodstream, which effect all the body's functions, over or under secretion can cause mental disturbances and negative emotions. Thus, by controlling the balance of hormonal secretions, one can control the mind and reach a more peaceful state.

Meditating has many other benefits. Individuals are able to handle tension better and, as mentioned before, increase their mental potential. But what does this mean and why bother?

Scientists speculate that human beings use only a fraction of their brains — supposedly 99% of it is fully wasted. On one level, meditators seek to shorten this alarmingly off-balance ratio by penetrating and expanding the brain. Through the methods used, they are able to fully utilize the capacity of the memory and eventually enter a "higher state of transcendental awareness."

Meditation classes will be held Mondays and Tuesdays throughout the semester in Campus Center rm. 178. This week the classes will run from 8 p.m. to 9 p.m.; thereafter, they will run from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. Attendees are expected to go one night a week.

Lost shoes in a Gothic explosion

Rent Party/Fifth Business
Club Soda
Saturday, Feb. 10

If you weren't at Club Soda to catch Rockin' Dave and the Rent Party Saturday night, you probably didn't have as much fun as the best mixed crowd any club has seen in several moons.

Musical figurehead of the Valley's finest rap-soul-zydeco band Dave brought his own irresistible concoction of dance music to the club on Gothic St. in Northampton in a manner that could only be described as Rockin'.

The night was launched with an energetic set by Fifth Business, an incredibly multipurpose grunge funk band whose sound ranges from heavy handed funk to frantically energetic rock, to a style that could best be defined as English Beat on speed. They played flawlessly and ripped through a cover of the Van Morrison song "Gloria," getting an enthusiastic audience response, revving the crowd right up for the Party.

Despite the fact that he doesn't even read music, Dave is able to compose songs so incredibly catchy, one finds it difficult, if not downright impossible, to sit still. He writes all of the music for the Rent Party, whose other members are so full of vigorous talent that the success of their recently released tape seems almost inevitable.

The evening's revelries were put on by Floyd Productions, an independent enterprise dedicated to providing high quality bands to an all ages audience.

"All ages shows are great because you get all the people who can't get into 18 and over shows. Audiences tend to be more energetic and are a lot of fun to play to," said Dave, now 25 years old. But the stigma of a horde of 14 year-old mall boppers with big hair that is sometimes attached to so-called "teen-clubs" certainly doesn't apply to Club Soda.

All ages meant just that — and all types.

The Rent Party in action.

There were older Rent Party and Fifth Business aficionado's quietly grooving away in the corners along with a beautiful year old baby (Alta) gazing dreamy eyed at the sexy washboard solo by Dave at the end of "The Rent Party Rap." All types and all ages were present, from one year to twenty-maybethirty-something folks, and all definitely got their money's worth.

By the end of the night a pile of shoes had amassed in the center of the high tech dance floor and, barefoot or not, everyone was able to stomp the Party out for a wildly received encore.

negotiations about negotiations in the next few weeks to decide what is going on."

Anil Kanjee, a member of the vigil, said he felt a "great want to go home."

"This means a great celebration of victory which we have fought for," Kanjee said. "It also brings us hope."

Smith college senior Desiree Lalberharie said when she talked to her family in South Africa, everyone was excited.

"My dad was whistling on the phone," Lalberharie said. "This is a memorable day. I always waited for it, but I never expected it. So when it came, I had to stay up."

"People in South Africa have been denied their leader for so long," Lalberharie said. "Now they have the chance to be with him. It is something very significant."

UMass graduate student Mpho Mohlala said he felt "ecstasy" when he watched Mandela walk out of jail.

"We stayed up to witness and to welcome the hero of South Africa," Mohlala said of Mandela. "He is the person we consider the president of South Africa and the future leader of our country."

Ntsoale said Mandela's release will strengthen the position of the ANC in South Africa.

"This release means Mandela, with the stature he has, will be able to give more direction for the ANC," Ntsoale said.

Mthwecu said he hopes the reaction of the United States is one similar to those of Black South Africans.

"Americans must rejoice with us," Mthwecu said. "It is important for them to continue to support us. This is their victory too."

Smith said he was puzzled why Amherst residents were reluctant to vote for student candidates.

"I've talked to some of the so-called town progressives. When it comes to students, they have a totally different philosophy," he said. "Maybe it is some form of xenophobia, a fear of outsiders coming in and taking over."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Keep your dealings honest and aboveboard. Secret relationships can cause strain; bring things out into the open. A real estate opportunity looks golden; seek a loan in order to make a down payment.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Delegate more day-to-day responsibility. Take time out to answer your personal correspondence. Higher-ups are impressed by your ability to produce good work under pressure.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Pay attention to a younger person's suggestions. A minor change could lead to a promotion. Diplomacy will win over someone who is obstinate. You could hear from an old flame.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): New friends show their loyalty in a startling way. Boost your spirits by adding to your wardrobe. Do not take anyone or anything for granted. Tackle household chores.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Partners are lucky for you now. Contact with the public will enhance your prestige. Dealing with authority figures could be very lucrative. Romance needs nurturing.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): You perform brilliantly today. Creative and original ideas count big with higher-ups. Think about the consequences of your words. A friend asks a favor you cannot refuse. Choose your associates more carefully.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Your past efforts begin to pay handsome dividends. Your career could take a giant step forward. Be more independent. Widen your social circle and you will make helpful new contacts. Do some entertaining.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Someone you thought to be your enemy becomes your strongest ally. A member of the opposite sex's presence could cloud your judgment. Buy a household item that will add to your comfort.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Get together with people who do not pressure you. A telephone message could bring welcome financial news. An influential person could ask pointed questions. Stand up for your rights.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Have more compassion for your coworkers. Think about the consequences of your words or actions. A change of plans will ultimately work in your favor; be patient. Keep your options open in romance.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): You find it easier to solve child-care problems now. Your creativity flourishes underpressure. Trying to change someone's mind will prove futile. Stop making excuses and recognize the real dilemma.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Stick to the facts when trying to settle a family dispute. A hasty decision could end up costing you a bundle. Stop avoiding a sensitive issue. A slight change in your lifestyle will work wonders.

■ men's hoop loses to Temple in 3 OTs

"I thought that was a big three," said Temple coach John Chaney. "I was looking at this young [Temple] club, and it was very good of them to stay involved, stay in control."

A free throw by Harden and two by Donald Hodge (25 points) tied it again. Giles hit two more free throws, and then Harden popped off a screen to bury his three.

UMass had two more chances, the last after Strickland missed a 1-and-1 with five seconds left. But Tony Barbee couldn't squeeze a shot off before the buzzer, and a capacity crowd of 4,024 went home, dejected but thoroughly entertained.

"I thought our kids did everything they could do," Calipari said. "There were a couple of plays that could've gone either way, and they always seem to go the other way."

UMass (12-10 overall, 7-6 in the Atlantic 10 Conference) has lost seven games by six points or less, including three one-point setbacks. Temple is 13-8 overall, and leads the A-10 at 11-2.

The score was knotted at 69-all after regulation, and UMass looked like it got a big break when Macon fouled out just 15 seconds into OT. William Herndon (21 points) hit both free throws to give the Minutemen the early edge.

But those would be UM's only points of the first session, matched by Strickland's tip-in with 42 ticks left.

The second OT was marred by the second heated clock dispute of the game. The first came with 3:44 left in regulation, when Temple clearly didn't get a shot off before the 45-second clock expired, but the officials didn't hear the buzzer and gave Temple a field goal. After discussion and a brief shoving match between Chaney and Calipari, the shot was disallowed.

On the second controversy, the score was tied 75-75 with six seconds left in OT No. 2. Mik Kilgore missed a shot and grabbed the rebound. Harper Williams got a piece of Kilgore on his follow-up, and a foul was called, but the officials later ruled the foul was after time had expired.

In regulation, Temple burst out to an early 19-12 lead, but never enjoyed that comfy edge again. UMass rallied to take the lead before Temple caught a big break. With time running out in the half, the crowd tried to rattle Kilgore into throwing up a shot early, by counting ahead of the clock.

It worked, but Kilgore somehow hit the 25-footer to put the Owls on top at the break, 36-32. Oh, what those three points may have meant later in the game.

In the second half, McCoy (23 points to lead UM) became the first UMass player to score 1,000 points as a sophomore. He needed 16 to achieve it, and got the magic number with a 14-footer from the right side with 13:39 to go. The game was stopped as Calipari presented McCoy with an inscribed ball.

Temple, which has won all 17 meetings with the Minutemen, squeezed into the lead before McCoy and Herndon hit key free throws down the stretch to force the overtimes.

Temple, 83-82

Massachusetts (82): Tony Barbee 1-3 1-2 3; Harper Williams 3-4 0-0 6; John Tate 2-3 0-0 4; Cary Herer 1-2 2-2 4; Jim McCoy 9-22 4-5 23; William Herndon 8-12 5-7 21; Rafer Giles 5-9 5-5 18; Tommy Pace 0-0 0-0 0; Anton Brown 1-3 1-2 3. Totals: 30-58 18-23 82.

Temple (83): Mark Strickland 3-6 0-1 6; Mik Kilgore 2-7 0-2 6; Donald Hodge 7-17 11-12 25; Michael Harden 3-6 1-2 9; Mark Macon 11-21 10-13 35; Shoun Randolph 1-3 0-0 2; Ernest Pollard 0-0 0-0 0; Johnnie Conic 0-0 0-0 0; Chris Lovelace 0-2 0-0 0. Totals: 27-62 22-30 83.

Halftime: Temple, 36-32. Regulation: 69-69. First OT: 71-71. Second OT: 75-75. Three-point goals: Massachusetts 4-8 (McCoy 1-1, Giles 3-6, Brown 0-1); Temple 7-11 (Kilgore 2-3, Harden 2-4, Macon 3-4). Fouled out: Macon, Herndon, Williams, Randolph. Rebounds: Massachusetts 28 (Herndon 5); Temple 43 (Hodge 14). Assists: Massachusetts 22 (Herer 12); Temple 12 (Harden 5). Total fouls: Massachusetts 23, Temple 21. Attendance: 4,024.

Sue Serafini had team-high 19 points Saturday, but the Minutewomen lost to Rutgers, 68-55 at the Cage.

two forwards were rarely stopped.

The difference in the game was the inside scoring, Rutgers complimented their inside game with a consistent variety of outside bombs. UMass tried to dump the ball in low to Keyburn McCusker and Helen Freeman, but Rutgers swarming defense refused to allow the UMass frontcourt any easy shots. Freeman and McCusker always had a Rutgers hand in their face when shooting, and thus, the burden of offense fell on the shoulders of the guards.

Michele Pytko and Sue Serafini each shot well but both were hounded all game by Rutgers guards. Serafini led all scorers with 19 points while Pytko added 15. Neither guard played particularly well but that can be attributed to the Rutgers defense and the UMass offense which geared itself around the inside game, which never was effective.

The loss dropped UMass to 3-18 for the season, while Rutgers hopes for an NCAA tournament bid remained alive, as they improved to 13-6 and 10-1 in the A-10.

"We know what these kids can do, if we get to a point this year that we can play two solid halves of basketball, then we really have got this program going in the right direction. Until we do that we've got miles and miles to go," Hewelt said.

DELTA UPSILON
The Benefits Are Endless

Don't just spend four routine years in college! Make these days the most exciting in your life. The brothers of Delta Upsilon are doing just that.

The benefits if you join DU: You become part of our house, but more importantly, a part of our brotherhood. You move into a house with 30 of your best friends for life. You aquire an unmatched social life. You eat catered foods prepared by our professional chef. You can participate in our competitive intramural program. We are currently in first place for the coveted Olympus Cup. Out of over 600 teams, our softball team made it to the final four. We are campus champions in track and field and cross country, and co-champions in the Greek area in tennis and wrestling.

In the midst of all the fun we have at Delta Upsilon, we pride ourselves on our academic achievements. As a house, we have a very respectable GPA compared to the all mens average. In addition, academic files are available in the house to help you get ahead. Our alumni offer special internships and co-ops for an added advantage in the game of life. From turf management to sports management, from economics to theater, from engineering to journalism, we have brothers in all majors. You can't lose, so come by and see for yourself the benefits Delta Upsilon has to offer.

If you have any questions, feel free to call us or drop by our house, located at 778 North Pleasant St. Our telephone number is 549-3831, ask for Matt or Steve for details. See you at Rush!

Fight decision in limbo

TOKYO (AP) — Four days before he fought Buster Douglas, a bored Mike Tyson told a news conference: "No way I can lose."

While Tyson still believes he's the heavyweight champion — even after he was knocked out by Douglas in the 10th round Sunday — the previously invincible heavyweight now has to deal with a loss, albeit a disputed one for now.

Tyson, who watches films of great fighters of the past, may now look to those former champions as he plans to regain the title.

"Greater fighters than I have lost," Tyson said Sunday night, dark glasses covering his battered face and a closed left eye.

The end of the fight was a scene to boggle the mind. As he hit the canvas in the 10th, Tyson mouthpiece popped about 18 inches into the air. He groped for it and put it in his mouth — backwards.

"The hardest part is coming back from losing to show how tough you are," Tyson said at a news conference where World Boxing Council and World Boxing Association officials said Iron Mike wasn't lost yet.

Because referee Octavio Meyran fouled up the count when Douglas was knocked down in the eighth round, the result was suspended pending meetings of the two organizations' executive committee.

As for now, however, the International Boxing Federation considers Tyson a loser and Douglas a champion. The IBF sanctioned the early afternoon fight, but had no representative present because the Japanese Boxing Commission does not recognize it.

Tyson left the Tokyo Dome without comment, but he returned about six hours later for a news conference.

first in all four events.

On the uneven bars, Lagrua finished first with a 9.55, followed by teammate Renee Danko's 9.2. UMass' Erika Baxter, not scheduled to compete, picked up third with a 9.1.

"Erika has been sick all week," Mitchell said. "She came through for us on the bars, though, hitting her routine for the first time this season."

Making her gymnastics debut, Jennifer Perry scored well on the bars, tying Marshall's score of 8.7. Perry also scored an 8.9 on the balance beam.

"Jennifer was a little nervous, but she came through and did a good job," Mitchell said.

On the beam and floor exercise, Lagrua and Marshall battled to a first and second place, respectively, with just a point separating them in each event. Coming in third on the beam was Turmail while Klier wrapped up third on the floor.

"We did better today than in the last two outings," Mitchell said. "I'm going to stay with the changes I've made in the rotation and once we get Erika back as an all-arounder, we'll be in good shape."

"I thought our team spirit was good," said junior Mitch Hall. "The lack of intensity was something we talked about in practice; it's not that hard to change, but it's something we have to change to succeed as a team."

"We realized that we were lacking enthusiasm," Eggers said. "Some of the older guys on the team got together and we decided that we have to put aside distractions and do what we have to do to succeed."

The Minutemen are about to enter the teeth of their schedule, starting with Tuesday's meet against rival Southern Connecticut State at Boyden. The Minutemen then begin a six-week oddysey that will include four regular season away meets and culminate in post-season performance.

"Things are coming together for us," senior co-captain Bart Balocki said. "But now we have to face Southern Connecticut and Temple — we have to go out and try to win some events. We want to show them that we have some top individuals."

Southern Connecticut has struggled with injuries, but has three superlative individual performers in senior Carlton Noble, junior Hector Salazar, and junior Shawn Simpson.

"You'll definitely get to see some great gymnastics," junior Andy Sullivan said. "I just hope we do well as team."

Swimmers blast BU

Victory is 13th straight

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming team closed out the regular season on a high note with a 138-105 win over the Boston University Terriers. The victory ends their perfect season, giving them a 13-0 record.

This meet was supposed to be one of the tough ones. But as it turned out, the Minutemen had a rather easy time. BU took six of the 13 events, but UMass took second and third place, along with seven first place finishes, to compile a large margin of victory.

The Terriers tried to jump out early and set the pace. They did just that in the 400-yard medley relay, but the Minutemen turned things around quickly in the next event, the 1000-yard freestyle.

In what was the most exciting event of the day, Scott Reed (9:51.09) put the Minutemen up for good with his victory in the 1000. Boston University's Jeff White got a quick lead, and held it through the first five laps. Reed got stronger and faster as the race progressed, while White hit the wall in the sixth lap. Reed overtook the lead and cruised to victory.

Things began to get worse for White, as the Minutemen's Frank Sampson got his second wind late in the race. Sampson began to close in at the end of the ninth lap. White managed to hang on just long enough as he finished just a few tenths of a second ahead of Sampson.

"I'm really pleased with their performance," said coach Russ Yarworth. "Frank gave a gutsy show. It was a real good swim for us."

As the meet progressed, the Minutemen took victory after victory. Chris Barrett won the 200-yard freestyle and Brian McIver with the 50-yard freestyle. The 200-yard individual medley brought the team and the crowd to their feet with the chant of "one, two, three!" as Jay Peluso, Curt Sawin, and Roger Kennedy swept the event.

At the halfway mark, UMass was up by 35 points with a surprising 64-29 lead.

"I thought the meet was going to be closer than it was," said Yarworth. "I knew there was the potential for this kind of outcome, but I didn't think it would happen."

BU began to make a comeback, winning five of the seven remaining events. Most impressivly was BU's Joel Beck on the diving boards. He defeated Dan Chesnicka on both the one-meter and the three-meter boards.

The Minutemen closed out the meet as Jay Peluso won the 200 breaststroke and the team of G.T. Ladd, Chris Barrett, Jim Robertson, and Brian McIver took the 400-yard freestyle relay.

"I'm really pleased with our performance," said Yarworth. "It was a good win, but we still have a lot of hard work ahead of us."

Minutemen are now training for their fourth consecutive New England Championship, which will be held in two weeks at the University of Rhode Island.

"We're the favorite to win," said Yarworth. "I'm not going to predict a victory, but we don't intend to lose."

Temple prevails, 83-82

Minutemen fall in triple-OT thriller; McCoy gets 1,000th point

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Oooh, this one hurts.

For the better part of 55 minutes on the clock, and about three hours of actual honest-to-goodness lapsed time, the University of Massachusetts men's hoop team and Temple University were locked in a fierce duel at the Curry Hicks Cage — one that neither wanted to lose, but were unable to win.

Finally, Michael Harden's three-pointer with 19 seconds left in the third overtime settled the matter, allowing the visiting Owls to escape town with their lives, 83-82 yesterday afternoon.

For the fan, this game had everything. Slams, jams, wild desperation shots, Jim McCoy's 1,000th career point, a true show by All-America guard Mark Macon (35 points), battles with the officials, battles between the coaches . . . and some thrilling hoop, to boot. One of those games where it was a shame anyone had to lose.

"This was a great game for the fans," said a drained and disappointed UMass coach John Calipari. "I lost 12 pounds, lost my voice and split my pants.

"Maybe it just wasn't meant to be today," he said.

Over the course of the three extra sessions, there were five ties and five more lead changes. To say it was a see-saw affair would be using a stale cliche, but one that is totally fitting of the way the game went.

"We won it seven times, and lost it eight times," Calipari said. "Unfortunately, that last shot was the eighth time."

It was tied at 75-all entering the third OT. Mark Strickland nailed a short jumper before Cary Herer (12 assists) tied it again with two clutch free throws. Then Rafer Giles nailed a three-pointer that put UMass on top, 80-77 with 2:35 to go.

Women's hoop falls to Rutgers, 68-55

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Saturday's women's hoop matinee in the Cage featured the mighty women of Rutgers University and our own Minutewomen, who will not be mistaken as a powerhouse.

"It's amazing to me the score was as close as it was considering how we played and didn't execute in the first half," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. Actually the Minutewomen lost this contest in a span of eight minutes in the first half.

With 12:35 remaining in the first stanza, UMass led 12-10. Rutgers guard Suzanne Cooper connected on a three-point shot that keyed an 18-0 run that spanned eight minutes, and put the women in red ahead for good.

During the eight-minute Rutgers reign of terror, Vicky Picott scored six of her 16 points and teammate Tanya Hansen added four of her team-high 18 points. Hansen continually hurt UMass on the offensive glass, where she scored most of her points on second chance lay-ups.

"One of the challenges in the first half that we had was listening and following directions, because we got away from our game plan, and every time we do that and have done that this year, it has created great problems for us," Hewelt said.

"We go down by 10 or 12 [points] and then we've got the whole second half that we spend battling back trying to get ourselves back in the game," Hewelt said.

UMass looked confused on offense, turning the ball over 21 times in the first 20 minutes. However, the Minutewomen only trailed by 13, 34-21 at half.

Freshman guard Patty Robak sparked the UMass offense in the second half by scoring seven points. But Rutgers had all the answers, as they continually went to Hansen and Picott when they needed a basket and the

Gymnasts upend MIT

John Eggers sounded like someone who came out on the short end of the stick after Saturday's men's gymnastics meet against the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Although the senior co-captain teamed with freshman Steve Christensen to help lead the University of Massachusetts (4-3) to a 248.15-131.5 victory over M.I.T. at Boyden Gymnastics Center, you wouldn't have known it from hearing him after the meet.

"Every once in a while, you bomb a test — well, today I bombed the test," Eggers said. "This was a good meet, if anything, to do badly in."

Although Eggers did see some positive aspects in his 50.85 all-around performance, he was unyielding in appraising his performance. "I'm disappointed with my performance today, although it was the first time all season I felt fresh.

"I've allowed myself too many mistakes so far this season — I can't do anything more wrong," Eggers said. "If you don't improve at this point in the season, you'll fall behind other good gymnasts and you'll never get back up to the point you want."

Christensen was the Minutemen's high scorer with a 52.30. "I was disappointed with my performance against Cortland (last Saturday) — I missed on my pommel horse and parallel bar routines," Christensen said.

"I did a few new things on floor and pommel horse," continued Christensen. "Also, on rings, I had only done my dismount once before."

The talented freshman was the Minutemen's high scorer on pommel horse (8.95), parallel bars (8.80) and high bar (8.75).

UMass brought an intensity to this meet that was lacking in last Saturday's third-place performance in a quad-meet at Boyden and in Wednesday's victory over Dartmouth.

Women's gymnastics grabs first in tri-meet

By CHRIS MIRACLE

The beat goes on for the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team, as the Minutewomen defeated both the University of Bridgeport and Rhode Island College Saturday at Bridgeport, Conn.

The Minutewomen (5-2), steamrolling through the early part of their schedule to chalk up their fourth consecutive victory, earned first place in the tri-meet, edging out Bridgeport's 178.15 with their 179.95, but with enough insurance against Rhode Island's third place score of 139.05.

"I was very impressed by Bridgeport," UMass coach Alfie Mitchell said. "By our better performance, their scores went up, too, which didn't help us."

The Purple Knights' Maurine Lagrua outscored all gymnasts, earning first individually with her total of 38. The Minutewomen's Tammy Marshall followed close behind with a second place finish of 37.2. Kristin Turmail and Erin Klier placed third and fourth, respectively.

"Maurine Lagrua did well in all the events, but I thought a couple were overscored," Mitchell said. "Tammy had a better routine on the floor, but because she went first she received a lower score. It was a little discouraging at times."

Marshall, adiing to her already-impressive rookie season, broke another school record on the vault, hitting a 9.7 and preventing Lagrua from placing

Bush optimistic on South Africa but still wary

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush expressed optimism yesterday that South Africa's release of Nelson Mandela was a sign the country was "at last" on the way to ending apartheid, but he showed no inclination to move quickly to lift U.S. economic sanctions.

Bush noted at a news conference that the legislation imposing the sanctions against South Africa also prevents him from ending them until specified liberalizing measures are taken.

"What I want to do is discuss three provisions with Mr. Mandela and with Mr. de Klerk," he said referring to the freed black leader and to South African President F. W. de Klerk who ordered his release.

Bush noted that he invited both men to the White House separately — with no time settled upon — and he added, "I also want to see them continue to talk with each other. And then out of that, I think we'll have a much more realistic picture of what the United States might do in the future."

The sanctions, imposed by Congress over then-President Reagan's veto in 1986, severely restrict U.S. investment in South Africa and purchases of the country's exports.

Bush said a White House visit by de Klerk would be a "major step" in U.S.-South African relations and a more substantive gesture would not be appropriate until after the visit. He said no conditions have been imposed on de Klerk's visit, which would be the first by a South African president.

Earlier yesterday, the assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Herman Cohen, had raised the possibility of an overture toward South Africa in return for the conciliatory steps de Klerk has taken.

Cohen, interviewed on NBC's "Today" show, said the adminstration is "rapidly reaching the point" whereby an easing of economic sanctions can be discussed because of the progress made thus far.

But Cohen added that no steps will be taken until there is close consultation with Congress.

Bush discussed South Africa during a ceremony for the visiting president of the Congo, Denis Sassou-Nguesso. He said that Mandela's release after 27 years in prison, "is another important sign that South Africa may soon begin negotiating a democratic non-racial society and at last be on the way to ending apartheid once and for all."

Later, in answer to questions at a news conference, Bush said he finds some of the sanctions counterproductive and he played down the suggestion that they had a key role in inducing South Africa to signal interest in forging a more equitable political system.

WCVB reporter to host fund-raiser

Wornick hosts lecture for Galligan Fund

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Susan Wornick, reporter for WCVB-TV Channel 5, is scheduled to host a benefit lecture at Framingham North High School to raise money for the Sharon Galligan Memorial Scholarship Fund.

Wornick said she decided to hold the benefit while covering the case.

"I came up with the idea of a speaking program [to raise funds], and ran it by the people at Framingham North High School," she said in a telephone interview yesterday.

Wornick said she hopes to generate questions from the audience by talking about how she got into television news, and about the business itself. She said she does not plan to discuss coverage of the Galligan case unless asked.

Wornick is scheduled to speak on Thursday, Feb. 15 at 7 p.m. in the Anketell Auditorium at Framingham North High School. All proceeds from the tickets, which are $5 each, will be donated to the scholarship fund.

Tickets can be purchased at the door of the auditorium, or from University of Massachusetts junior Marc Pruskin.

Pruskin, a marketing major who graduated from high school with Galligan, said he and several other UMass students who attended Framingham North High School are trying to sell 100 tickets for the benefit.

"I figure that as her friends, it's the least we can to do to help ease the pain," he said.

Kathy Johnston, president of the Chi Omega sorority, of which Galligan was a member, said the sorority has no plans to attend the speaking program because of rush week.

She added that the sorority is collecting donations for a tree planting, but will not be able to concentrate their planning efforts until after next week.

Study reveals decreased AIDS cases on campuses

Average of two students per 1,000 test positive

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Although the Centers for Disease Control reported last fall that 20 to 25 percent of people diagnosed with AIDS are in the college age group of 20 to 29, actual reported cases on college campuses have been quite low, according to David P. Kraft, M.D., executive director of the University Health Services.

In a study of 19 college campuses across the country, conducted last fall by the American College Health Association and the Centers for Disease Control, which included the University of Massachusetts, it was found that on the average for the 19 schools two students per thousand were positive for HIV antibodies.

Blood for the studies was obtained by samples collected for other purposes and then anonymously tested for the virus. Of the 19 colleges participating, 10 had no cases reported, five had between four and nine cases per thousand and the remaing four schools had between one and three cases per thousand.

The study reported that prior to this study, the highest percent of AIDS reported in an institution had been four cases per thousand, which was found in a study of prision inmates.

According to Kraft, UMass has been asked to participate in the study for the second year by the CDC, for which it will receive $5,000 to reimburse the costs of the testing, with any remaining funds distributed for AIDS related educational materials.

He estimates that the result of this year's study will almost mirror last year's study because cases of AIDS have been leveling off in some high risk groups.

Kraft said the December AIDS Newsletter, distributed by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, reported Hampshire County had the lowest incidence of reported AIDS cases in the state.

Kraft was unable to give any information concerning AIDS cases at UMass due to University policy, but said he estimates a very low amount of cases on campus.

"Most campuses tend to have less cases of AIDS than the general population, although the cases at colleges are usually present but not known," Kraft said.

He said even though reported cases on campuses are low, students should still take precautions when having sex. According to Kraft, the University is educating with "sensitive and straightfoward" information about safe sex techniques.

Kraft said the University also houses an alternative testing site for AIDS, one of many across the state, at which anyone in the area can be tested for the virus, with complete confidentiality.

According to the Centers for Disease Control, there were 98,255 reported cases of AIDS in the U.S. and 151,000 cases reported worldwide with an estimated 1.5 million cases in the U.S. and an estimated 375,000 cases worldwide.

USSR wants presidential rule

MOSCOW (AP) – Soviet leaders called yesterday for a special session of Congress to strengthen the office of the president, a move that would solidify Mikhail S. Gorbachev's hold on power.

The development, coming on the heels of a landmark Communist Party meeting at which the party agreed to give up its constitutional monopoly on power, would strengthen the government and further erode the party apparatus that has ruled the country for 72 years.

Gorbachev now holds the offices of party general-secretary and of president. The new powers being proposed for the president would make it more of a Western-style office. Tass said the presidium of the Supreme Soviet, the country's highest executive body, "unanimously favored the establishment of democratic presidential power in our country."

The statement did not say whether the president should be directly elected by voters, but one of Gorbachev's key allies on the Communist Party Politburo said last week that a nationwide popular election might be possible.

Foreign Minister Eduard R. Shevardnadze, speaking at the three-day meeting last week of the party's policy-making Central Committee, said a new draft of the Soviet Constitution now being written could include "direct and general elections for the president of the country."

Gorbachev ducked the question of whether he would run for president if the office were up for national balloting.

"Let's wait and see," he told reporters on hand for his meeting Friday with U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III. The party's Central Committee approved the idea of a strong presidency at its meeting last week. But in the text of its new platform, released Monday night in Moscow, the party leadership left open the question of how the president should be selected. It said a strong presidency is necessary to ensure stability, make reforms irreversible, make all government institutions democratic, ensure law and order and represent the Soviet Union abroad. Tass said the presidium, headed by Gorbachev, would ask the Supreme Soviet to call the Congress of People's Deputies into session in the near future.

Peace group boycotts Folgers

BOSTON – A peace group has called for a nationwide boycott of Folgers coffee as part of a protest against the U.S.-backed government of El Salvador.

Rob Everts, New England director of the San Francisco-based group, Neighbor to Neighbor, said Folgers, a Procter & Gamble Co. product was targeted for the boycott because it was the largest U.S. coffee firm and bought more beans from El Salvador than any other company.

The group held a rally Saturday at the city's Faneuil Hall before marching to Boston Harbor to dump Salvadoran coffee into the water in an updated reenactment of the Boston Tea Party.

Protestors said the boycott would help end violence in El Salvador by draining money going to the government and wealthy plantation owners. Coffee is a $200 million cash crop in El Salvador and accounts for about 5 percent of the coffee drunk in the United States.

More than 71,000 people have been killed in El Salvador in the past decade. The U.S. government has provided about $3.5 billion to help the rightist government oppose insurgents in the country.

"The death squads protect the plantation owners," Rosario Acosta, a Salvadoran labor leader who attended the demonstration, said through an interpreter. "Salvadoran coffee is tainted with the blood of many workers. The boycott will save many lives."

AT A GLANCE

BOSTON (AP) – Digital Equipment Corporation hopes to capitalize on the political and economic changes sweeping Eastern Europe by starting a venture in Hungary to sell and service the company's computer products, officials said yesterday.

Digital, based in Maynard, plans to make the official announcement today in Budapest, said Mark Fredrickson, a company spokesman.

The joint venture, to be called Digital Equipment (Hungary) Ltd., is expected to open business April 2, marketing, selling and servicing computers and software.

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) – Air force planes and helicopters strafed and bombed suspected leftist positions near a northeastern village Sunday, killing at least six people and wounding 20, a witness said.

A U.S. congressional delegation led by Rep. Joe Moakley (D-Mass.) arrived to investigate the killing of six Jesuits, their housekeeper and her daughter.

The 14-member delegation will meet with government, military, church, union and human rights officials as part of its investigation.

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat said Sunday the growing controversy over Soviet-Jewish emigration to Israel will jeopardize efforts for a peaceful settlement to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Arafat appealed to the Soviet Union to rescind an agreement with Israel for direct flights between Moscow and Tel Aviv for immigrants, and he urged Arab leaders to convene an emergency Arab summit.

BOSTON (AP) – In one of the rare anti-smoking lawsuits to reach the courtroom, lawyers opened a trial yesterday against The American Tobacco Co., which is defending itself from liability in the death of a cigarette smoker.

The case has been brought by Joanne Kotler, of Cambridge, whose husband, George Kotler, died of lung cancer four years ago at age 55.

Mrs. Kotler contends that American Tobacco, a subsidiary of American Brands Inc. in Greenwich, Conn., failed to warn about the health risks of smoking until being forced to do so by the federal government in 1966.

Six students travel to Model UN

UMass one of 200 schools represented at convention at Harvard

By MARYANNE MARTIN
Collegian Correspondent

Six University of Massachusetts students are scheduled to travel to Harvard University Thursday to represent Mozambique as part of the Model United Nations Convention.

"The Model UN gives me a chance to enhance my personal skills, like public speaking, while also helping to solve world problems," said Jill Davidson, model UN president and head delegate at UMass.

Some 200 schools across the country will also be attending the three day convention.

Davidson began the student-run program at UMass last semester.

As a student at Westfield State College, she was involved with the Model UN program. When she transferred here last fall, she used her experience to start an organization at UMass.

At the convention, university students will form general assembly committees and will discuss issues such as apartheid, nuclear arms transfer, diplomatic privileges, and decolonization.

Davidson said debating from the standpoint of the countries the students represent is the most interesting aspect of the program.

"It is very interesting because you are the delegate for that country," she said. "I am representing a socialist nation. I find it fascinating to discover the position of other countries."

The Model UN gives students from all over the country a chance to meet and exchange ideas concerning today's most pertinent world issues, Davidson said. Representing foreign countries forces students to put aside American policies and look at these issues from a very different perspective, she said.

"It is amazing to represent a country you are not familiar with and compare the ideologies with a western society," said Davidson.

Even though the Model UN is a relatively new organization on campus, it's members have made big plans for the future. They will be attending many more conferences throughout the country, Davidson said. In addition, they have recruited delegates from the United Nations to come to UMass as guest speakers, she said.

Davidson said the Model UN has taught her invaluable diplomacy skills, as well as a general knowledge of the world. The Model UN welcomes students of all majors to become involved. No prior experience is necessary.

Any interested students can contact Jill Davidson at 546-4006, or Jerry Cohen at 546-4618, or drop a note in Box 310 in the SGA Office at 420 Student Union.

Range of people meet to promote peace

Mandela's release from prison adds to excitement of event

By MARC RITCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

People representing more than 20 countries and different religions gathered Sunday night at the First Congregational church in Amherst to celebrate and promote world peace through different faiths and forms of worship.

The theme of the service "One World, United For Peace" included song, scripture, dance, slides, a bell choir and an international potluck dinner.

Lynn Vendien, the chairperson of International Sundays, said the event is one of the better events in the area. Planning for the multi-dimensional evening begins in November and involves many telephone calls to find participants originally from countries such as Cambodia, Iran, Jamaica and the Phillipines, she said.

Nelson Mandela's release from prision heightened the enthusiasm of the congregation. When one participant identified himself as South African the audience burst into applause and cheers of joy in response to Mandela's release.

The service began with a trumpet introduction as children of seven world religions participated in a candle lighting ceremony.

Rev. Carlos W. Anderson and his Hope (also known as Heaven On Planet Earth) Community Church Choir received rousing applause for their performances.

Dr. Jamal Elias, of Pakistan, a professor of religion at Amherst College, gave the Interfaith Meditation. He praised the peace that is spreading through Eastern Europe, but he pointed out that many parts of the world still suffer from poverty, war and exploitation.

He spoke of the great freedom in the United States he has experienced as an immigrant and stressed that Americans must, above all else, encourage human rights throughout the world.

Rep: Battle of sexes still present

By JULIE McKENNA
Collegian Correspondent

The biggest challenge for a woman in politics is not being part of the "good ole boy gang," but instead, women have to learn to work with men, according to Shannon O'Brien, the democratic representative from the Second Hampshire District.

She said in her lecture at Smith College Sunday titled, "Women in State Politics: Challenges in the 1990s," that there still is a large battle of the sexes on the political level.

"As a woman it's difficult to find the right balance because you have to be feminine yet strong," O'Brien said.

O'Brien said as a politician she has allowed small sexist comments to slide.

"If you keep fighting the small battles you'll never make it to the big fights," she said.

It is important to be an active participant in politics, she said, adding that if you are not working on a campaign, at least read beyond the headlines of a newspaper because politics in Massachusetts will be changing.

O'Brien said women in politics will be on the rise as a new speaker takes the house.

"I can think of women who will be in positions of power and hopefully I will too," she said.

She said there are some drawbacks being in politics.

"It's like being in junior high again, everybody knows everyone else's business and you usually end up in the gossip columns," O'Brien said. "Unfortunately it still holds true that gossip is always biased against women."

Lack of nursing faculty affects qualified students

The nation is facing a nursing shortage and qualified students are being turned away from the profession due to a lack of faculty, according to a December survey conducted by the American Association of College Nursing.

An effort to teach nursing students must be made, to help decrease the nursing shortage in this nation, said Melanie Dreher, dean of students of the School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts.

"This is worthwhile, you feel the satisfaction of educating students," Dreher said.

"We are the hardest hit University in the nation in the nursing shortage," she said.

Last year only four out of 154 qualified transfer students were admitted to the School of Nursing, due to the budget crisis, Dreher said.

The University currently has about 170 undergraduate nursing students in its four-year baccalaureate program and about 80 graduate degree students, Dreher said.

"We gave an enormous demand for our nursing program, but we don't have the faculty to admit students," she said.

Dreher said the nurses who have advanced degrees are lured from teaching positions to better paid jobs in hospitals and private health-care agencies.

Musicians play for choice

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Musicians Casselberry-DuPree, Mary Chapin Carpenter, Garnet Rodgers and Chris Smither took part in a pro-choice production Sunday at the Academy of Music to benefit the Abortion Rights Fund of Western Massachusetts.

Marlene Fried, a representative of the fund said: "We've never had a fund-raiser like this before."

She said most of their fund-raisers usually take place in someone's home and are very quiet.

Fried explained the importance of this type of fund raising.

"It feels like this was a real coming out," she said. "Basically [the bands were important] to show that support for choice is being endorsed."

Although the music itself was not geared toward abortion rights, the artists performed for free and said the cause is worthy of their time and energy.

Garnet Rodgers said: "I'm glad to be here today, but I wish I didn't have to be."

Judith Casselberry said: "We like to have all our options. Don't tell me what to do."

Fried estimated that two thousand dollars was raised. She said because no one at the Abortion Rights Fund is on payroll all the money would be used to help others.

The group grants interest-free loans available to women who need abortions and also provides free pregnancy testing, Fried said.

The group has expanded its activities to include organizing a speaker's bureau, post-abortion support groups, local outreach and sending buses to the pro-choice march on Washington scheduled for April.

The organization has come far since its start in 1987, and the group has many plans in the works. In May the group plans to sponsor a fund-raising art auction held at the Albion Mill in Montague.

A true appreciation of Valentine's Day

Erin Martin

Last week, I attended the funeral of someone I had known since kindergarten. High school friends and classmates came home from colleges all over the States to pay their last respects. And as I stood in line, I thought about a lot of things — past and present. But mostly I thought about myself, my family, my friends, and my life.

Over the past ten months, three people from my hometown have died before their twenty-first birthdays. And each time I heard the shocking news, my reaction was the same. So young, so unexpected! It could have been anyone! It could have been my best friend, my sister . . . it could have been me.

Whenever someone dies, there's a feeling of loss. But when someone dies young, it really hits home. Even if you didn't really know the person, you get scared.

We expect to live forever. We expect to get married, go through a mid-life crisis, and eventually collect retirement and social security.

Every wake I have been to was terrible. Each was equally upsetting, people cried and families mourned.

But the last wake made me realize something beyond my immediate feelings. When I approached the closed casket, I looked at Dave's senior picture long and hard. It was then that I noticed a poem in a frame off to the side, with his name and grade 6 printed beneath it.

As I leaned over to read it, I could barely get past the title. In capital letters were the words, "Beautiful is . . ." Instantly I felt my eyes fill with tears as I struggled to read on.

" . . . Beautiful is a mountain stream, a young boy's laughter . . ." My mind began to wander to the beautiful things in my life. I thought of my family, all of whom mean the world to me. I stood still, trying to recall memories of Dave, but all I could think about was myself.

Life really is too short. We walk around every day, probably not giving a second thought about what we say, how we act towards others.

What if we knew what to expect in our lives? Would that make us act differently? Would we then do the things we put off doing? Would we say all the things we were afraid to tell someone?

When the wake ended, I went home and told my parents I loved them and how much I needed them. When I got back to school, I wanted to call up all my friends and invite them over.

I started to feel as though everyone I ever knew or cared about could leave me at any moment. I became scared as I lay in my bed crying.

I was crying because Dave had no way of knowing he was going to die. Neither did Bryan or Mike. They were students just like us. They were good-looking, athletic, everyday people. Just like us.

At that very moment, I vowed I was going to change my ways. I was going to start by patching up torn relationships. I wasn't going to hold grudges, and I wasn't going to argue with my roommates about the trash. I was going to appreciate my parents for all that they do for me. I was going to study hard, have fun and be a better person. I was going to write and call old friends that I had let slip away.

Maybe this seems like an unrealistic request to ask of myself, but it comes at a good time of year.

Tomorrow is Valentine's Day.

Although it's a "holiday" that most single people dread, February fourteenth doesn't have to mean chocolates and roses to everyone. It means love to anyone who is capable of feeling!

Although it took a horrible loss to realize what I might be missing, maybe you can relate to this story. Take the time this Valentine's Day to send a card to your best friend or call your mother for something other than money.

Take the time to think about all the things in your life that are beautiful to you.

You'll be happy you did.

The meatloaf melodrama

Meredith O'Brien

Little Johnny was tired of having meatloaf for dinner every Monday night. No matter how much he tried to reason, plead and beg with his parents, they just wouldn't listen.

For dinner tonight — meatloaf as usual.

Well this time Johnny had the edge. He knew how to beat his parents into submission. "They'll never make meatloaf again," he laughed.

You see, Johnny had a plan. . .he would put a chain around his neck and the big birch tree in the front yard. He figured that his parents would be so embarrassed by his protest that they would swear never to serve meatloaf again.

At six o'clock, Johnny sat down, chained himself to the tree and laid the key a few feet in front of him — out of his reach.

"Soon they'll sit down to dinner and scream for me," he said mischievously. "When they realize I'm not in the house, I'll yell and tell them my demands."

Sure enough, minutes later both of his parents came out of the house with their hands on their hips.

"What do you think you're doing?" his mother shouted to him.

"Just as I planned," he smirked to himself.

"I'm protesting meatloaf," Johnny pronounced. "Until you promise never to serve it again, I'm going to sit here, chained to this tree."

"I see," his father said smiling just a bit. "And where did you get this master plan?"

Johnny grinned even wider. He was so clever that he amazed himself.

"I saw it on the news last night," he said. "A bunch of people were protesting some clinic in Springfield and chained themselves to poles. The police came out and used the jaws of life to get them out! They got to wear these neat helmets!"

"Was this the anti-abortion protest?" Johnny's mother asked his father.

"Yep," he said. "We were watching it together last night, right, buddy?"

His parents stood silently for a moment. Then his mother grabbed his father's arm. "I'm really hungry, Paul, are you?"

Nodding his head, Paul headed for the house, "Yeah, I'm really hungry. . .see ya later, Johnny."

Little Johnny's jaw dropped. "Hey, this isn't in my plan!" he scowled. "I never thought I had such mean parents!"

At seven o'clock his parents had just finished cleaning up the dinner dishes. Johnny was still sitting outside chained to the birch tree with a terrible sneer on his face.

"Do you think we're being cruel?" his mother asked.

"Not in the least," he replied, pulling some coffee out of the cupboard. "The police should have just left those abortion protesters outside all night too! Maybe if they had spent the evening with their necks chained up, a bit of a stiff neck, they would realize that they were being childish."

"Well you know how I feel about those Operation Rescue people anyway," she said. "They don't know how to peacefully protest like we did. They just know how to hurt people."

"We can let him in at eight," he said. "He'll be so hungry by then that he won't even care if he has meatloaf."

Johnny grew more cranky as he tried to figure out what went wrong with his plan. "I just don't understand it," he said, rubbing the back of his neck and pulling at the hair that was caught in the chain. "Where are all of the cops? Where are all of the neighbors protesting child cruelty?"

"People are so apathetic!" he shouted, looking to the kitchen windows and watching his parents eat the last of the chocolate ice cream.

Recognizing valuable services

While I otherwise considered Peter Leon's column, ("Notes from the Campus Center Basement," Feb. 12) well-thought out and amusing, I must point out that the laser printer in our office is here for a reason, one that I wish more student organizations would recognize and take advantage of.

Despite our misleading title, we are not here for SGA publicity, but for use by registered student organizations for any graphic needs. The laser printer is part of our desk-top publishing system designed to produce flyers, posters, CATE guides, newsletters for groups like WMUA, student newspapers (or "politically slanted journals," such as the Valley Women's Voice,) and even an occasional ad for the Collegian.

The SGA already plans to merge us with Student Notes and Printing Service for failing to attract the amount of interest we deserve.

We are only too willing to provide these free services to RSOs and students who come to us.

A SINGLE POINT OF LIGHT

A detached administration

David R. Mark

The episode last semester regarding Provost O'Brien's handling of professors suspected of supporting the student strike helps explain what's wrong at the University of Massachusetts. O'Brien, he of the occasional superiority complex, has become one of several noted "enemies of the students." And though he may have deserved the title, he is guilty more of being unable to work with or even talk to the students at length.

Therein lies a tale of two campuses.

General Motors produces cars, Hostess produces cupcakes and the University of Massachusetts produces graduates. The difference between the three is that while occasional glitches get corrected at GM and Hostess, and executives work hard with employees to produce a better product, no such event occurs at UMass.

The analogy is not perfect, but neither is our University. We have, in fact, two different Universities here in Amherst — the one where the administration works and the one where students go to class.

The two rarely mix.

Whitmore is a castle, ruled not so much by the vice chancellors of paper clips and other household utensils but by people unable or unwilling to work with students.

We are in the midst of a budget crisis, as you and I both know, but we are also in the midst of a leadership crisis. Last semester, the student strike came and went with nary a good word from Whitmore. It was not surprising, for there is a long history of administrators not working with students in times of need.

Those of you who are juniors or seniors may remember the sudden alcohol ban Chancellor Duffey enforced a couple of years ago. What you may not know is that Duffey circumvented a student-staff committee working on a set of rules regarding alcohol in the residence halls. The committee, after the ban, became meaningless.

As a former Collegian editor, I've had the luxury of sitting on several committees with associate chancellors, assistant chancellors and other University staff. Anyone with the opportunity to discuss the future of the University with someone in a position of power has a chance to make a difference.

Various members of the above group would ask me what I thought this campus needed. I would present several somewhat creative ideas for how administrators could work with students on large, hopefully fun projects, etc. Of the several committees and several dozen ideas, one — the pay phone by Herter Hall (intended to help people call the escort service late at night after getting off a bus) — has been acted upon. I care about UMass as much as anyone, but I could see the writing on the wall. Thus, no more committees and no more ideas no one wants to use.

It makes one stop and wonder exactly what the administrators in Whitmore expect from students. Should we just be docile youngsters working toward our respective degrees, allowing administrators to work in their own little world? Or should we be expected to act as partners in a relationship needed to make the University of Massachusetts a first-rate institution?

Let the people in Whitmore decide and no doubt the majority will choose option A. But if they do — and they have since I've been here — then they are no better than the legislators in Boston who don't understand public higher education.

The only difference is that the people in Whitmore are educators . . . supposedly.

ARTS & LIVING

Banning porn no solution

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

I address you today not as a proponent of pornography but as an opponent of censorship. Censorship of any material, no matter how offensive, is wrong and more offensive than the material that is censored.

ART ATTACK

We, as a community at UMass, claim to revel in our diversity. Therefore, it seems hypocritical that we would censor any type of medium that appeals to certain people. For the Board of Governors to consider banning pornography from the magazine racks on campus is utterly reprehensible.

If we ban Playboy, Playgirl, and Penthouse, what will be next? Do we ban High Times for advocating drug use? Do we ban magazines that cover heavy metal and rap artists whose lyrics have been found to be anti-Semitic, racist, or sexist? Where do we stop? The possibilities of how far the disease of censorship can spread are endless and frightening.

There are those who charge that soft-porn magazines increase violence towards women. However, these people seem clueless to the fact that the Meese commission on pornography could find no plausible link between pornography and violence against women. The charge that pornography is a contributor to such violence is subject to ridicule. Rape is an act of power and control on the part of the perpetrator, not an act of lust.

If it was true that pornography increases violence towards women, one has to question why this hasn't been the case in European nations. For example, there is an abundance of pornography in Denmark but rape is almost non-existent there.

Although these magazines are sometimes used to enhance the masturbation process, they are more than just skin magazines. Playboy, for instance, is a fine showcase of journalistic talent. It is known for its exceptional articles and insightful interviews. Why they combine intellectual prowess with crotch shots is questionable, but nevertheless their prerogative and their right is guaranteed by the First Amendment.

It seems to me that there are some who will have us believe that if we banned pornography, violence against women would stop.

With this in mind, and to conclude, I recall a statement made by Benjamin Franklin, "Those who sacrifice liberty for the sake of safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

A pro-choice musical Sunday with everything under the sun

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

Pro-Choice Benefit Concert
Academy of Music
Sunday, Feb. 11

The theme was diversity on Sunday, when a few very different musicians, including headliners Casselberry-Dupree, got together to benefit abortion clinics and the pro-choice movement.

As Canadian folksinger Garnet Rodgers took the stage, dim, golden light showered his strong, solid stance, giving his physical image the same power his deep, husky voice emitted.

As a large audience listened quietly, it was easy to see Rodgers isasmuch a storyteller as a musician. Through his eyes, we learn to look admiringly on common folk, and simple pleasures.

His songs juxtapose compassion and humor, making it evident that humor is beautiful. But even more important, it is real.

The next artist to take the stage was Mary Chapin Carpenter. She eased the show into more rhythmic song, but the stories were still there.

Many of her songs deal with the pain of lost love, and have a feeling of intimacy, as though her songs are reflections of herself. At the same time, her music is easy to relate to, especially for the sentimental dreamer. One song, "A Love Affair With a Shirt," touched on sentimental attachment we all harbor for select material objects.

Chris Smither, a New Orleans blues singer, again changed the course of the music. Armed with contrast, his songs emit foolish lyrics juxtaposed with a knowing sensibility, and alternating rhythm and pitch that holds your attention. He effortlessly lulled the audience into a perfect state for the attack of Casselberry-DuPree, the main attraction.

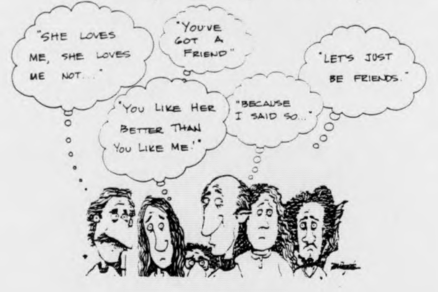
Vitality swept over the stage, bright contrasting costumes yielded handsome diversity — and with their music, the audience came alive.

It was a heavy reggae beat, with occasional gospel overtones. After just two songs, the all female band had fans dancing in the aisles.

Between songs they gave a few political opinions, announcing their happiness for the release of Mandela.

On the subject of the benefit, Casselberry declared, "We are women, and like to have all our options," adding, "Don't tell me what to do."

The evening ended with everyone in the house dancing and clapping — not one person was left sitting. It was a fantastic sample of four very different artists, bound together yielding a feeling of commonality.



"SHE LOVES ME, SHE LOVES ME NOT..."
"YOU'VE GOT A FRIEND"
"LET'S JUST BE FRIENDS."
"YOU LIKE HER BETTER THAN YOU LIKE ME!"
"BECAUSE I SAID SO..."

WOMEN'S ISSUES

Just the bare necessities

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

Every fifteen seconds a woman is beaten in the United States and every three minutes a woman is raped. And in Massachusetts alone, a woman is killed by her batterer every fifteen days.

These statistics, from the Massachusetts Coalition of Battered Women's Service Groups, only represent the high incidence of violence toward women.

But Gail Kielson, director of Necessities/Necesidades, a battered women's shelter in Northampton, said these figures do not reflect the intensity of such horrid incidents.

Kielson has worked with the shelter for five of its eleven years. She works with battered women daily and speaks of the brutality in solemn, sensitive words.

"A woman calls us with much trepidation and fear. She has tried to convince herself that he [her abuser] will stop kicking her, strangling her, raping her, degrading her, hitting her, keeping her a prisoner in her own house," she said, describing a typical call for help.

Her words reflect mourning for the pain, suffering, and deaths of battered women; yet with equal conviction she mourns the future of Necessities/Necesidades.

Last year (fiscal year 1990), the shelter suffered a budget cut of nearly $18,000. As a result, their community education coordinator and housing and welfare advocacy programs were eliminated.

Susan Stinson, the shelter's administrative coordinator, said services in the shelter have also suffered.

For instance, volunteer Holly Curtis explained, "We only have $100 for the whole year for child advocacy" adding, "there's a lot you wish you could do for them that you can't."

In addition to the eight-bed shelter, Necessities/Necesidades offers a 24-hour hotline, counseling, support groups, and crisis intervention. With this, the shelter is down to the bare necessities.

As Kielson put it, "We are on death's doorstep, and need money to stay alive."

Kielson regrets that she is sometimes forced to turn women away from the shelter, which holds about three women and their children, placing them in potentially dangerous situations.

At this time when funds are needed desperately, Necessities/Necesidades and other battered women's services in the state can expect a 25 percent budget reduction if President Bush's budget is passed, Kielson said.

Kielson said this means Necessities/Necesidades stands to lose $39,500 of its annual $150,000 allotment.

Stinson said some Massachusetts shelters may close, yet Necessities/Necesidades, which receives funding from the state Department of Social Services, grants from the town of Amherst, along with private contributions and fundraisers is not expected to close.

She said, however, that such a huge cut would put an end to counseling services at the shelter.

But Kielson, less optimistic for the shelter's future, said: "I don't know what else can be cut."

Additionally, Curtis pointed out that current budget reductions have bred disorganization.

"Instead of having specific factions, there's just one group to do everything and there aren't enough people to finish things," she said.

Kielson said: "There isn't a replacement for us. There's no other body that can replace us because of our expertise and our analysis of battering. When a woman comes to us she hears something new, and that's what helps her in terms of empowerment."

Laurie Goidel Morrison, a former battered woman who sought help from Necessities/Necesidades, where she is now a board member, said, "The help I got at N/N opened my eyes and saved my life. If it wasn't for N/N, I would be dead, and my child an orphan."

Kielson also works actively against pornography.

"My goal is to attempt to get men to stop supporting the nine billion dollar industry."

"[Pornography] is very connected to violence against women," she said.

Kielson added that staff at the shelter help all battered women, including lesbians involved in abusive situations. Counseling and protection at the shelter extends to emotional, psychological, and sexual, as well as physical abuse.

"On a state level, Battered Women's service groups are asking that people who are concerned about a budget that eliminates all counseling money for battered women wear a red armband on February 14," Kielson said.

Feminists reflect on 17th anniversary of Roe v. Wade

By DAVID ALLEN FORRESTER
Collegian Staff

On January 22, 1973, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Harry Blackmun read the court's decision legalizing abortion. Two University of Massachusetts professors, Ann Ferguson and Arlene Avakian, were leading different lives then but their reactions were similar.

"I was elated," said Avakian, a woman studies professor. "I felt it was the beginning of what I hoped would be a long string of victories for women."

Avakian was raising her two children in Ithaca, N.Y. She said her transition from faculty wife to University professor was a product of the women's movement.

Ferguson, who was teaching at the University of Massachusetts in 1973, echoed Avakian's feelings.

"I felt it was extremely important," said Ferguson, a philosophy professor. "It was a success for the women's movement."

Both women had been involved with abortion rights activism before Roe v. Wade. Avakian had helped women from the United States obtain abortions in Canada and England.

Ferguson was a member of the Valley Women's Union in Northampton. The women's center later moved to the University and became the precursor to the Everywoman's Center.

With the seventeenth anniversary of the decision last month, these women reflected on the revision of abortion rights laws due to the 1989 Supreme Court decision in the Webster case in which control of abortion laws was granted to individual states. Several states already have restricted portions of the Roe v. Wade decision.

Avakian said: "This victory [Roe v. Wade] has been chipped away at. This and others. And we are now in danger of losing, and have lost, a good deal of what we had gained in 1973."

Avakian and Ferguson said the right of poor women and young women to have abortions has been severely curtailed.

They assert this is mainly due to restrictions on government funding of abortions and laws that are now in effect in many states that require women under 18 years of age to have the consent of parents or a judge.

Ferguson, while angered by the recent setbacks in abortion rights, remains optimistic. She said recent polls of the American public have found that between 60 and 70 percent of the population feels that abortion is a matter of personal morality.

"I feel both upset at the gains of the 'new right' and empowered by the fact that it seems this restriction on Roe v. Wade has also engendered a wave of activism for women and men who feel that we should maintain this right," Ferguson said.

Both women said the way to ensure abortion rights is through state government. They said electing state officials who are for abortion rights can negate the effects of the court's decision in the Webster case.

Lt. Gov. Evelyn Murphy, Democratic candidate for governor of Massachusetts, has sought to make abortion a central campaign issue although some conservative advocates have claimed that there is too much emphasis put on the abortion issue. Ferguson said the conservatives' argument is sexist.

Ferguson said: "When people try to make abortion an important political issue someone says, 'Oh, special interest group — this is unfair.' But this is nothing new, this has happened ever since U.S. politics began."

Avakian, however, said the abortion issue cannot be the sole one in the Massachusetts gubernatorial race.

"People's lives are in jeopardy in this state," Avakian said. "There are schools in this state that are unsafe for children to be in. Although abortion is an issue that is incredibly important in women's lives, there are other things that are as important."

Ferguson said this issue is an opening for women to rally around all women's issues.

"But it's not inevitable which way it will go," Ferguson said. "It depends on how successful the pro-choice campaigns go and whether or not they connect sexism in general in this society to this one area of denial of women's rights."

Avakian agrees, "We can undo what has been done."

Victim/Witness offers support

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

One out of 5 dating relationships is abusive on college campuses, according Kathleen Alexander, the head of Victim/Witness Assistance.

Victim/Witness is a unit of the District Attorney's office in Northampton. The program provides victims and witnesses with information about the court process, their rights and supports them throughout the criminal justice process.

"Violence in society is a real serious problem," Alexander said. "When someone has been victimized it can be devastating."

Alexander has had many counselling experiences. She began working at Victim/Witness in April, 1989. She also worked at Day Break, a center in Worcester for women who have experienced violence. She also worked at the Everywoman's Center for 6 years.

Alexander said she has learned through her experiences and years of working with victims that it is necessary to have services which non-judgmentally give support and respect in the recovery process.

"A lot of people do not understand the court process that is where we come in," said Michele Googeon, a Victim/Witness advocate. She serves as a liasion between victims and witnesses and prosecutors and prepares them for the trial.

Joyce, a relative of a victim who used the services said, 'Kathy Alexander in particular and Victim/Witness in general were instrumental in lending emotional support and advocacy about the legal process."

Joyce said: "People in society hesitate to press charges because it seems larger than life and Victim/Witness helps to really demystify the legal process."

Deb Levy, the volunteer coordinator for the Everywoman's Center at the University of Massachusetts, uses the Victim/Witness services to provide information and support for rape survivors through the legal process.

"We work together as a team," said Levy. "It is very helpful to have someone explain the process because it can be very scary."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Your recent efforts begin to pay off; your career surges forward. An influential person plays a role in your success. Adherence to a diet-and-exercise program helps you create a new image.

TAURUS(Arpil 20-May 20): Give more thought to the consequences of your words and deeds. A friend makes an offer you cannot refuse. Get agreements in writing - it could prevent embarrassment later on. Promote family harmony.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Set a good example. The calm way you handle a difficult situation will impress your offspring, especially if you ask the right questions. Resist the temptation to go on a shopping spree.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Arguments with loved ones will not make for a tranquil home. Kind words will! Investing in real estate could be a wise move; know what you are doing, however. Shop carefully to save money.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): A free exchange of ideas with trusted friends or colleagues will be mutually beneficial. If someone tries your patience, smile. Keep any criticisms to yourself. Loved one shares a happy secret.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept.22): Events beyond your control are featured. Word from afar may not arrive in time. A change of plans will work in your favor even if you do not realize it immediately. Romance improves.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Stick with tried-and-proven monetary maneuvers; a gamble will only land you in hot water. You are ecstatic about a last-minute invitation. If you want, romance can be free of commitments.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Your creativity is at an all-time high. Think twice about a business expansion; the timing could be all wrong. Use your power wisely to avoid making enemies. A romantic puzzle is solved.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Work will go well today if you concentrate on projects you can handle alone. A change of lifestyle results in greater comfort. Strive for harmony in romance. Be less critical.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Some of you are anxious to solve a financial problem. Employer could grant a loan in an emergency. Ultimately, the family budget will have to be revised. Tact improves a parent-child relationship.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Initiative and courage bring fantastic results. Exercise greater self-discipline. If you are wise, you will not try to rush a new romance. Trial living arrangements could end up costing you money.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Great news about a free-lance assignment sends your spirits soaring. Children need to know your plans. Unobtrusive teamwork is the key to greater domestic harmony. You discover romance on your own doorstep.

All three relay teams took first as they set new Oval records. The 4x800-meter team finished with a time of 9:48.8 leading off with junior Cathy Crocker, followed by senior Shana Smith, freshman Mo Meldrim and Becky Johnson.

Senior Julie Muccini led off for the 4x400-meter relay team with her personal best (60 seconds), followed by freshmen Dana Smith and Lennice Johnson with Ambrose wrapping up a team time of 4:04.5.

Piccioli, who has been nursing tendonitis of the patella, made her mark again by placing first in the triple jump (36-1/2), setting a school record and breaking another Oval record. Lennice Johnson placed third in that event. Piccioli then placed third in the 55-meter hurdles.

An Oval record was tied by Ambrose in the 55-meter dash (7.2), with McFayden placing fourth (7.5) in that event.

Muccini smashed the Oval record by 11 seconds in the 600-yard taking first (1:28.4). Lennice Johnson placed third (1:30.5) and Dana Smith placed fourth (1.31.3).

The only first place ribbon of the day came from Gerry Squires in the 5000-meters with a time 15:32.

The second place finishes were performed by Jerome Bledsoe (21-11 in the long jump), Steve Brown (1:12 in the 600-meter), Art Smith (8:38 in the 3000-meter) and the distance medley team with a 10:34 combined time.

This is where the Minutemen were hurt by the Black Bears the most, as they had three third-place finishers compared to UMass' zero.

O'Brien, however, feels that Maine isn't necessarily better than UMass, but just had a more error-free day.

"There's little room for mistakes in a championship-caliber meet," said O'Brien. "We just happened to have a slightly weaker day, but these teams could easily flip-flop on any other day."

Joe Edgerton flung the shot put 47-1, giving the Minutemen some needed weight points. His fourth place finish was matched by Joe Livorsi in the 5000-meter (15:48), Herb Heffner in the 1000-meter (2:16), James Chute in the mile (4:19), and the 4x400- and 4x800-meter relay teams in times of 3:26 and 8:08, respectively.

While UMass and Maine battled it out for second place, Southern Connecticut was busy putting the meet out of reach as seven athletes grabbed either first or second place finishes.

Other Minutemen to place included Kevin Walters in the 200- and 60-meter dashes, Garfield Vaughn in the 400-meter and Chip Mitchell, also in the 60-meters.

day's 248-131 win over the Massachusetts Institute of Technology will need to carry on beyond tomorrow for UMass to enjoy the success which brought them a 9-2 record last season.

"I think practice has been really good recently — we were able to get pumped up for the MIT meet," Healey said. "Before that, we just realized we were too laid back in practice and meets.

"Everybody on the team wanted to win; we've all worked hard," continued Healey. "There was just a line we needed to cross to make commitments — and we've crossed that line."

1 MORE DAY 'TIL VALENTINES DAY!

SPORTS

A fan mourns his fallen idol

There are some things you just take as given; things like the world is round.

Things like the sun rises every day.

Things like Mike Tyson will be heavyweight champion of the world until there is no one left stupid enough to want to fight him.

For me, sitting in a bar on Saturday night and watching still photographs on the television of Tyson falling to the canvas, the world is no longer round.

Al Kaufman

Mike Tyson was, and still is, a god to me. Growing up in the streets of New York, fighting came as natural to him as talking. And his fists earned him more respect than his squeaky voice.

He took boxing back to its original, primal form and beauty; fighting for survival. Tyson was a warrior. Come Larry Holmes, come Frank Bruno, come Michael Spinks, even come Robin Givens. Nothing could stop Iron Mike. In a topsy-turvy world where governments are changing faster than traffic lights, you could always look at the WBC, WBA and IBF heavyweight standings, see Mike Tyson's name on top, and say, "At least there's some stability in the world."

Enter Buster Douglas. Who? Buster Douglas.

The only odds Las Vegas could get on this fight was if Tyson would knock out this nobody in the third or fourth round. This fight was nothing more than a warm-up for Tyson's real fight on June 18 against Evander Holyfield.

Tyson has overcome so much in his troubled life. Growing up in the streets of New York, getting shuffled from foster home to foster home, losing his foster father and trainer Cus DeMato and ducking jabs and cheap shots from his former wife, the greedy Robin Givens.

Fighting a man named "Buster" would seem like a vacation compared to all this.

Maybe that was the problem. Maybe Tyson did take it as a vacation. He came in ten pounds over his ideal fighting weight. He spoke of retirement many times before the fight. His killer instinct just wasn't there. He was acting, well, human.

But it didn't matter. After all, even a "human" Mike Tyson could beat a man named Buster.

But he couldn't.

It doesn't matter that Tyson may have scored a technical knock out in the 8th round if the referee didn't screw up the count. It doesn't matter if the WBA and WBC never officially take the belt away from Tyson because of this technicality.

What matters is that the mythical Mike Tyson was beaten silly by a man named Buster. What matters is that the muscular ox was reduced to a huge heap lying dazed on canvas, groping for a mouthpiece that flew out when his hulking mass plopped to the ground.

What matters is that a champion, a god, has fallen.

I was shocked when Leonard beat Hagler. I cried tears of loss when John Lennon was killed and tears of joy when the Berlin Wall fell.

But when Mike Tyson lost the heavyweight boxing title, I only felt numb.

I'm not sure the sun is going to rise tomorrow.

Harriers find success up north

• Men third at Maine meet

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Maine had a couple of surprises for the University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team on Saturday at the Eastern Collegiate Championships in Orono, Maine.

The first surprise came as the host Black Bears (88 points) edged the Minutemen (75 points) for second place behind winner Southern Connecticut State University (123 points).

The second surprise came on Monday in the form of a letter informing UMass coach Ken O'Brien that the majority of his team needed measles vaccination shots, because of two cases discovered at Maine over the weekend.

What does that mean for the UMass men's track team?

According to Public Health Nurse Jeanne Lardner, not much.

"It's important to stress that it [measles] is not on this campus," said Lardner. "We are simply making sure it stays off."

Lardner added that because the UMass track members were given shots within 72 hours of their trip to Maine there is no chance of infection.

Heading into the meet O'Brien knew that his team would have to have around 12 people finish somewhere in the top three or four places of their respective events, in order for them to beat out Maine and New Hampshire for second.

Unfortunately, O'Brien got 10, including five fourth place finishes.

"Any two places could have changed everything," said O'Brien. "Fourteen of 15 scored for us, but we just had too many in fourth and fifth place. Maine had the better day. They deserved to win."

• Women set records at UNH

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women harriers may not be winners by virtue of points, but qualifying for ECACs thrice, setting three school records, taking eight first places and breaking eight facility records is nothing to sneeze at.

Saturday UMass finished in second place with 54 points, as Rhode Island placed first with 64 points and New Hampshire took third with 35 points.

"[New Hampshire] doesn't have a fast track, so the [Paul Sweet] Oval records were low-to-average," said head coach Julie LaFreniere in reference to the Durham, NH indoor track. "We didn't just break the records, we smashed them."

Placing second, senior Christina White qualified for ECACs and set a school record as well as a personal record in the 20-pound weight event throwing 45-11 1/2.

"She had a nice series [of throws]," LaFreniere said. "Things are really happening for her."

In the 1000-yard event, freshman Becky Johnson ran away with a time of 2:35.3 taking first, qualifying for ECACs, breaking the school record, setting a personal record and knocking the Oval record.

"She blew everyone away in that event," said LaFreniere. "Her performance was outstanding."

Also taking first and breaking an Oval record was sophomore LeeAnn Ambrose who ran the 200-meter in 25.5 seconds. A clerk for the Oval remarked Ambrose's time is the fastest he's ever seen that event run.

Women's hoop visits Harvard

Minutewomen try to snap losing streak vs. Crimson

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will try and get on the winning end of things tonight when it takes on Harvard at Briggs Athletic Center. UMass enters the contest 3-18 (1-12 in the Atlantic 10) while Harvard, fresh off two victories last weekend, is 9-9 (4-3 in the Ivy League.)

The Crimson figure to pepper the basket with a variety of outside shots tonight. Last week they were the top team in the country in three-point shooting. For the season they have hit 84 treys at a success rate of 46 percent. Their top three-point shooter is freshman guard Aerin Maher, who is 29-59 this season.

Maher does more than just hit three-pointers though. She averages 9.2 ppg on outside shots as well as drives to the basket. Last week she was named Ivy League Rookie of the Week, when she averaged 14.5 ppg in two games.

Joining her in the starting five are guard Beth Wambach, center Jen Mazanec and forwards Maura Hegley and Sandy Springer. Wambach is the leading scorer (16 ppg) while Springer is the top rebounder (5.6).

"They're (Harvard) struggling," said Minutewomen assistant coach Mary Vail. "But they always play us tough and we have to go there to play."

UMass is still looking for that one game in which it gets balanced scoring. One game Helen Freeman hits for 33 points and the next Sue Serafini gets 19. One game Michele Pytko gets two points and the next she notches 15. What coach Kathy Hewelt needs is for everyone to get involved in the offense. Not to have one, or even two people go wild, but for three of four people to score some points. Only then will balence be created.

As for the dismal record, Vail insists that the team is not getting down. "We're staying real positive," she said. "The players know they can win this one."

Men's gymnastics hosts So. Conn.

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Southern Connecticut State is the most ballyhooed 0-3 team to enter the Boyden Gymnastics Center in years. The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team has good reason to respect Southern — they haven't beaten them at home since 1970.

Although Southern has struggled with injuries and a lack of depth, the team has formidable troika of individual performers in senior Carlton Noble, and juniors Hector Salazar and Shawn Simpson.

"All three of them are outstanding performers," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "Our all-arounders have to make sure their routines are in line with those of Southern Connecticut's top gymnasts."

Salazar, from Lima, Peru, has been a member of the Peruvian national team and has competed in the 1987 World Championships in Rotterdam, Holland. Simpson and Noble both competed in the NCAA championships last season.

After that, Southern drops off considerably. The team started the season with only eight performers, and two have been unable to dress because of injuries. On Feb. 4, Noble, Salazar, and Simpson all scored extremely well, but Southern lost, 257-217 to Springfield College.

"At the college level, gymnastics is a team sport," junior Rich Healey said. "Even so, trying to go out and beat someone like Hector Salazar would be a major accomplishment."

"We're up for this meet — we still have to prove ourselves as a 260's-level team," senior co-captain Bart Balocki said. "Southern Connecticut's individuals will provide a lot of motivation for us."

Freshman Steve Christensen, one of the Minutemen's top all-around performers, downplays the individual match-ups. "I'm more into the team — I get pumped up for the good team meets," said Christensen, who wasn't even born the last time UMass beat Southern here in Amherst.

Tonight's meet will be the Minutemen's last performance of the season at home. UMass will have four more regular season away meets, beginning with a Feb. 18 date at Temple.

The intensity that the Minutemen

Diplomats stress SA is still an apartheid system

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

Worldwide celebrations for Nelson Mandela's unconditional release from prison should not overshadow that the South African government still operates by the apartheid system, African leaders said last night.

Solomon Gomes of the Organization of African Unity and Seloka Phirwa of the African National Congress, both diplomats at the United Nations, led a panel discussion on Africa's political future in front of about 100 people in the Student Union Ballroom.

Solomon Gomes from the Organization of African Unity speaks at UMass last night.

Phirwa said the recent concessions by the South African government to legalize opposition groups do not mean apartheid has been abolished.

"Nelson Mandela is free and the [world's] jubilation and excitement is appreciated," he said. "But that is not enough. Many other political prisoners remain in jail. A state of emergency still remains. At [Mandela's] welcome back rally in Capetown, [there were] reports of some casualties from clashes with police.

"It is a reality we must live with. When I say live with it, I don't mean accept it," Phirwa said.

Gomes criticized George Bush's joint invitation to Nelson Mandela and South African President F. W. de Klerk to come to Washington, saying Bush deliberately ignored other ANC leaders.

The ANC, Phirwa said, has called for a democratic, non-racial united South African government. The ANC believes in armed struggle, but only after first trying negotiations, he said.

"It is a credit to the people of South Africa that we still wish for a Democratic state [which will] protect even the right of our oppressors," he said.

Gomes shifted the discussion's focus to other problems facing the African continent such as famine, drought, debt to industrialized nations, and corrupt leadership.

"Africa is like a patient who is very sick," he said. "There are 10,000 doctors each writing a different prescription."

The OAU's goal, Gomes said, is for the African states to pool their resources and unite as one country.

"A united Africa is a threat to the international club. The London club, the Paris club, the Tokyo club," he said.

"Unless we have a population that is well-fed, those efforts will be for naught," Gomes said. "Governments are using food as a weapon."

The event was sponsored by the University of Massachusetts African Student Association in commemoration of Afro-American History Month.

Some members of the audience concluded the event by raising their fists and singing "Nkosi Sikele i Africa," the anti-apartheid anthem of South Africa.

Pro-choice entertainment with local comedy theater

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

The pro-choice comedy Womb for Rent, the first production of the all-female Sleeveless Theatre, will be presented at Northampton's Center For the Arts this Thursday through Sunday.

The production has shown in the area twice before but changes have been made and this will be the final version, said Lisa Channner, a spokesperson for the group.

Channer said the inspiration for the production came from the recent Webster Supreme Court decision which allowed states more control over abortion.

"It was all we could think about," she said. "We created the show because we were so angry and instead of being destructive we were creative."

Channer reflected on the possible overturn of the landmark Roe v. Wade decision, "It's a very frightening thought that abortion could be illegal," she said.

"Our side needs support," she said, the show offers that rare support. "There are no shows that we know of that deal with abortion in a comedic manner." "People come in that are pro-choice and are relieved" she said. "I think it inspires people to go out and do something. We're really reaching people and that's why we can keep doing it."

The production was written, directed, and performed as a collective effort between Lisa Channer, Maureen Futtner, Terianne Falcone, Kate Nugent, and K.D. Halpin; the five members of the Sleevless Theatre.

"We really work well together, and we feel very much at home here," said Channer who, along with Futtner, graduated from the University of Massachusetts last Spring. Falcone graduated from Smith College, while the others attended college in New York and Conneticut.

Channer said she feels their diverse personalities, and skills complement each other nicely. "It must have been fate that brought us together," she said.

The Sleeveless Theatre is working on several other projects at this time, including Terianne Falcone's comic account Two Women and an Apple: The Story of Pandora and Eve.

This show is based on the biblical story of Adam and Eve, as well as the Greek myth of Pandora, and will be at the Center for Arts in April.

"Along with that we are going to show War: The Comedy" said Channer, adding "We want to look at war and violence; where it comes from and why."

The finished version of War will return in July, and again in September. Internationally, the group will perform Womb for Rent at the Fringe Festival in Edinburg, Scottland this August.

Channer said she hopes their success is encouraging to students, and shows that people do things after they graduate.

Security measures taken

New locks are response to campus break-ins

By ANDY CANTILLON
Collegian Correspondent

University Housing Services installed new locks in McNamara Residence Hall Monday in response to a series of break-ins which occured during intersession, said Joseph Zannini, director of Housing Services.

But a University employee said yesterday the potential for additional break-ins will not be reduced until locks in other residence halls on campus are also changed.

Because someone may have had access to the master keys of the residence halls, the employee said, the entire residential lock system is 'broken.' The term 'broken' is used to describe a situation which is still vulnerable to break-ins.

Although the residence hall keys carry a prohibition against duplication, the University employee said: "If you have the money you can get a copy."

Zannini would not comment on whether lock systems would be changed in other residence halls.

Last week Zannini said a Housing Services employee was under investigation for possible links to Robert W. Gonsalves and Richard Harrigan, of Amherst. Both men have been charged with breaking and entering, larceny and receiving stolen property in connection with the break-ins.

Lt. Michael Grabieck of the UMass Department of Public Safety yesterday would neither confirm nor deny that a

AIDS on the rise on campuses

The number of reported cases of AIDS and the HIV virus that often is a precursor to AIDS on college campuses is high and on the rise, said David P. Kraft, M.D., executive director of University Health Services.

A study by the American College Health Association and the Centers for Disease Control last fall of 19 college campuses, including the University of Massachusetts, found that an average of two per 1,000 tested positive for HIV antibodies, he said.

Contrary to reports published yesterday in the Collegian, Kraft said the statistic is an alarming figure. Urging students to use contraceptives that block transmission of bodily fluids during sex, Kraft said the statistic is not as high as the four per thousand average common in prisons but remains a focus of concern.

"If the rate is two per 1,000 and you figure we've got 25,000 students [at UMass], you're talking about 50 students possibily walking around on campus with the virus," Kraft said.

The study reported that 20 to 25 percent of people diagnosed as having AIDS are between the ages of 20 and 29. AIDS, which attacks the body's immune system, leaves its victims susceptible to various diseases and cancers.

"Basically, the number of AIDS cases is increasing in the United States including among college students," he said.

But, because it takes six to nine years for AIDS symptoms to develop and people may unknowingly be carrying the HIV virus, the seemingly low number of AIDS cases in college age students may be misleading, he said.

Grabieck added: "Until all of the [stolen] property is recovered this case will not be closed."

Suggestion to check on water quality in private wells made

By JIM COHEN
Collegian Staff

A low-cost proposal by four University of Massachusetts researchers to monitor private wells could help regulate water quality, said its principal investigator.

Carolyn Harper, an agricultural and resource economics professor at UMass said monitoring the quality of water from private wells would cost the state about $50,000 initially and $2,000 in annual maintenance.

The initial amount would be used by the Department of Environmental Protection to create and maintain a database of private wells, she said. The database would be available to government agencies, academic researchers and the public to examine what areas are showing problems that should be looked into.

"If we had private well data we'd be infinitely ahead of the game in being able to monitor water quality," Harper said.

Under Massachusetts law, municipal wells are required to test for pollutants and contaminants; however private wells are not.

Private wells serve about 400,000 people in Massachusetts, she said.

Even when private wells are tested, they are usually tested for only some of the possibly hundreds of contaminants, Harper said.

Researcher Cleve Willis said the DEP received the proposal for the database and sent their approval and appreciation. But, he said, "They are not able to act on it because there's no money in the budget."

While the full program cannot be effected presently because of budget considerations, Harper said, "a test pilot program using three wells will conducted."

"The gains to gathering the information would outweigh the very small cost [to the state]," Willis said.

"Massachusetts has fallen behind other states in the area" on the issue of monitoring water quality, Harper said. She said a similar program to the one her group has presented began in New York. Although the idea is similar, 'New York has the money,' Harper said.

"It's unfortunate that areas that the public cares about, like the environment, are suffering because a lack of funding," Harper said. "An information system like this would help regulate groundwater better,' she said.

Human activist to speak

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

George Lakey, 25-year peace activist and trainer in non-violence, is scheduled to speak tonight on endangered human rights in Sri Lanka at 7:30 p.m. in Memorial Hall.

Lakey, who went to Sri Lanka as part of the Sri Lankan Support group and Peace Brigades International, has been active in fighting for social change and human rights through diplomacy and non-violence.

The speech is sponsored by the Sri Lankan Support Group, which was founded last November in Greenfield.

Jim Matson, member of the Sri Lankan Support Group, said that getting active in the Peace Brigade, which is based in Greenfield, is a "direct way to get involved in the fight for peace."

Matson said, "It takes a great deal of courage to be involved with the peace brigade."

He added that by publicizing the work of people like George Lakey, the Sri Lankan Support Group hopes to encourage more people to participate in the group's causes.

Peace Brigades International has been active for six years in Guatemala and two years in El Salvador protecting human rights activists and disseminating information on human rights violations, Matson said.

Author calls for gays to develop new framework

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

The gay, lesbian and bisexual community needs a framework different from that of the heterosexual community in order to combat supression, according to George Lakey, co-author of No Turning Back: Lesbian and Gay Liberation in the 80's.

Speaking last night in the Campus Center, Lakey stressed that to affirm diversity, a society needs to listen to the leadership of different communities, not just the demands of individuals, in order to create a sociogram of an even society.

"You can't have a sexually liberated society without changes in all other parts of society," he said.

Lakey, who has been a civil rights activist for over 30 years, said oppressed groups should not struggle to reach the mainstream, but the mainstream itself needs to change to encase all groups.

He said the gay, lesbian and bisexual community needs to come out to achieve changes in the mainstream.

"The character of our oppression has been invisibility, unlike other minorities, we're not easily identified. What society wants from us most is to stay were we are so they don't have to deal with the issue," he said.

Although homosexuals may be afraid to come out because of negative reactions, Lakey said the more people who do come out, the less negative those reactions will be.

"Every oppression depends on cooperation with the oppression, the more we put up with, the less we'll get," he said.

Lakey said it is essential that any social movement or change progress without violence. He said Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. is the best example of how someone can achieve change without violence.

He said the struggle for gay, lesbian and bisexual liberation has been difficult, but added that although the movement may have seemed slow at times, the accomplishments of the past 20 years have been outstanding.

"We have seen so many changes in just getting people to talk about the issue, 30 years ago homsexuality just wasn't talked about at all, now we've made people recognize what's going on," Lakey said.

Lakey said he has also been active with a number of other social causes and recently returned from Sri Lanka, where he was helping students against government oppression. He will speak on his experiences in Sri Lanka tonight at 7:30 in Memorial Hall.

Speaking out against racism

Russel McCloud urges students to help each other

By AUDREY DEANNA LLOYD
Collegian Correspondent

Patricia Russel-McCloud, the professional orator who beckoned an audience of over 200 students and faculty members last October to "R.S.V.P. if you please to the call for excellence" returned to the University on Monday for a special engagement as a guest lecturer for Black history month.

"The call is for those who refuse to settle for less," Russell-McCloud said.

With pride and certainty, Russell-McCloud echoed "Nelson Mandela is free, he is free at last," to an audience of over 100, in the Student Union Ballroom.

Russell-McCloud cautioned the audience to remember that Black South Africa is still held captive under the system of Apartheid. "As long as one minority is unsafe, all minorities are unsafe," Russell-McCloud said.

Russell-McCloud's analogy "Racism is like rain. It is either falling or somewhere gathering," aroused the audience to applaud enthusiastically, said Russell-McCloud.

Afro-Americans share a culture rich with accomplishments and contributions to the history of America, she said. One of her main goals of the evening was to instill in the audience that they should celebrate who they are and take pride in it.

Using the famous words of the slain civil rights leader, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., "A man can not ride your back unless it is bent," Russell-McCloud reinforced her point that self- motivation and awareness are essential for the "survival of the fittest."

In regards to the political, social, and economic climate in America today, Russell-McCloud said, "we are living in a society that calls itself color blind, but it is actually color conscious."

"When America catches a cold, Black America catches pneumonia.

"We are always willing to go around the world to fight wars for others, but we are not willing to go across the street to help each other," Russell-McCloud said.

She urged audience members to make an effort to help one another to achieve their goals.

Russell-McCloud presently lives in Atlanta, where she heads Russell-McCloud and Associates. She is a graduate of Howard University School of Law, Kentucky State University and Harvard University where she completed an intensive study program in Law. She is certified to practice before the U.S. Supreme Court, District of Columbia and Indiana Bar Association. Russell-McCloud is also the former National Parliamentarian for the Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Inc. and the recipient of more than 25 keys to cities throughout the United States.

Beer confiscated

Police confiscated a keg of beer from Pierpont Residence Hall Saturday, police said. Eleven people not signed into the residence hall were escorted off campus, police said.

In other police reports:

ARRESTS

A motor vehicle stop on Commonwealth Ave. and Governors Dr. resulted in the arrest of Manuel Casalduc, 20, of Kennedy Residence Hall, Saturday for operating under the influence, failing to keep to the right, and expired inspection sticker.

FOCUS

Injecting some truth into the news of the world

A look at another UMass paper: The Weekly News, and opinions

By WILLIAM GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

"You must be able to write what you think, and maybe what you write about your day-to-day, everyday, ordinary life will be some of the same problems that the people of the world are fighting out.
You must be able to write
what you have to say,
and know that that is what matters.
And I hope you can see that you can begin anywhere and end up as far as anybody else has reached.
I hope you are not scared to write about what concerns you,
what you know:
these things matter."
— C.L.R.James, A Few Words to the Writer.

When the pre-eminant Marxist scholar C.L.R. James wrote those words he was directing them toward everyone. Sadly, few have picked up on or even heard of the genius. One person who has is David Caputo, the publisher and founder of The Weekly News. In fact the quote above was reproduced in the 8th issue of the newspaper. In the same edition is a plug to write for the journal, obviously influenced by James' quote:

"If you are sick of corporate media newspeak and government brainwashing then write us . . . Outrage is a terrible thing to waste."

It was over breakfast on January 15, 1989 that Caputo and a number of friends decided to start a newspaper they would want to read; a paper that would utilize all of the outrage felt by what would become the Weekly News staff.

Eleven days later the first issue of the Weekly News hit the stands.

Caputo, who is the publisher of The Weekly News, said the paper is a non-profit, photocopied effort to take information and distill it into some semblance of the truth.

The paper takes information from places such as the Boston Globe, National Public Radio, and journals such as the Utne Reader, In These Times, The Nation, and Mother Jones.

"It's all a matter of reading between the lines," he said. Caputo also cites books as a great influence, particularly "The Political Economy of the Media" by Ed Herman and Noam Chomsky, and other books put out by the International Oil Working Group Inc. press.

"I would like the Weekly News to be a cross between The Nation and The Utne Reader," Caputo said. Some of the paper is actually filled with articles reprinted from journals such as the Nation and the Greenpeace newsletter, just as the Utne Reader is largely made up of the best articles from the alternative press as a whole.

Mykal Ostapovicz, credited as being the paper's "organizer," said he prefers to remain in the shadows. There are about a dozen regular contributers to the paper.

The Weekly News has a circulation of about 2000 and is printed in a manner which lends itself to photocopying, Caputo said. The paper has subscribers from as far away as Alaska, California and Florida, according to Caputo.

The venture is a "network" effort, Ostapovicz said.

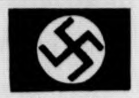
And all of this is being done as part of a UMass project for academic credit through the Social Thought and Political Economy department at UMass.

Funding comes from advertising, donations, and Caputo's own pocket.

The advertising is limited to companies who do business in a manner Caputo agrees with, he said. Businesses such as Domino's have been turned down because "we don't want to be hypocrites," Ostapovicz said referring to a recent boycott of Domino's pizza due to the owner's support of anti-abortion groups.

Advertising is limited to businesses that "are cool, that are producing things I would buy," Caputo said.

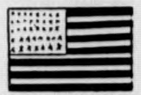
1932 GERMANY



"Whoever publicly profanes the Reich or one of the states incorporated into it, its Constitution, colors or flag or the German armed forces, or maliciously and with premeditation exposes them to contempt, shall be punished by imprisonment."

December 19, 1932, RGB 1-1, Statutory Criminal Law of Germany

1989 U.S.A.



"(a)(1) Whoever knowingly mutilates, defaces, burns, or tramples upon any flag of the United States shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(b) As used in this section the term 'flag of the United States' means any flag of the United States or any part thereof, made of any substance, of any size, in a form that is commonly displayed."

Reprinted with permission of the Weekly News

One way of getting your point accross

The result is a 20 page stapled newsletter filled with strong, informative, opinionated writing which Caputo said is decidedly left of center. Caputo said he does not believe in the theory of 'objective journalism.'

Caputo has a regular column called Bush Whacking, in which he regularly finds reasons to attack the Bush administration.

The Weekly News is very anti-establishment and operates on what Caputo calls a 'What the fuck' principle.'

He said he thinks many people read newspapers critically. "You see, you're frequently going to see the news and say what the f—k," he said commenting on the lack of credibility of much of today's newspapers.

Letter from the Publisher,(first issue of the Weekly News)

Welcome to the first edition of our new underground newspaper, "The Weekly News." We have patterned ourselves in the best tradition of the SAMIDZAT newspapers of the Soviet Union, and other underground newspapers the world over. We are attempting to take control over a piece of the information distribution world. In our paper we can write freely what we think. We can write about our lives. We encourage you to write about your life and what is of concern to you. It is no secret that we face a myriad of problems in our world. Some of these are life threatening. Yet somehow we dance and love and sing and write and spit in the eye of terror. We are not in rehearsal to be the victims of history. We are struggling to be remembered in history. If our world is crushed by the accumulative weight of excessive stupidities and venal profiteering, "history" will become a meaningless term. We have no choice but to prevent this from happening. We live and breathe the beauty that is life. Our lives give us the strength and resolve to create our own future. The power in these writings proves this true.

— DAVID CAPUTO

Caputo said he does not want to become a Registered Student Organization. "I would lose control of it. The one perogative is to keep this paper under my control," he said, adding that at heart he is a "small scale socially responsible eco-capitalist."

The recent addition of desk-top publishing is improving the technical aspects of the venture. A Macintosh SE/30, a laser printer and a map filled with pins from the 350 subcriber locations now clutter the office.

"We used to do paste up with selotape," Caputo said, but now it's all done on computer.

"I feel that "objective journalism" is a bunch of shit," he said. "It's merely pretending to be objective. You may try to hide that, but a side is always given insidiously." Caputo's point is that his newspaper is honest because it doesn't pretend to be objective in any sense.

"Take the New York Times," he said. "It's a huge corporation, and to say it doesn't have an axe to grind, or that people aren't hoping to get appointments to cushy jobs in Bush's administration [is innacurate]. I mean that's the reality. All we're saying is that this is the world as we see it."

Taking a smaller world view, Caputo opined on the Minuteman, an occasionally read newspaper with non-partisan political views (read - Republican). "I've made a significant effort to reach out to the Republican club to engage in significant debate. And some of the people are actually intelligent enough to engage in something other than abusive rhetoric," he said.

"The basic problem," Caputo continued "is that they buy the government line, hook, line and sinker, but some of them do occasionally consider the opposite."

W. Matthew Whiting, editor in chief of the Minuteman, vehemently denied this charge, saying he didn't even know who Caputo was. "I am a libertarian and I do not buy the government's line," he said.

He pointed to the logo of the Minuteman: "Veritas Vincit," meaning the truth shall conquer, and said "I am very proud of everyone who's worked on this paper."

Caputo was surprised by this statement as he claims to have engaged in several screaming matches with Whiting, but he said, "I'll go introduce myself again. He knows who I am." "I have a lot of contempt for [the Minuteman]," he said.

Beth Bandy and Jonathon Levitt of The Radical Student Union said there is a need for some coherance of vision in the local alternative press. "We've talked about coordinating our efforts, but a lot of people have their vision already defined, and people are kinda' stubborn," Bandy said

"The Minuteman and ZuNews have got a sense of humour," said Levett,"because they recognize that the mainstream is not doing anything either."

Bandy continued to say that the "Minuteman isn't competition, it's just a thorn."

Whiting responded for the Minuteman by paraphrasing the words of John Stuart Mill. "The best ideas ultimately rise to the top and those ideas which fail to meet the history of time will cease to exist," he said.

Whiting also said he felt his paper's "superior ideas" will become part of the mainstream.

The Weekly News has not been without criticism, most notably for its lack of production values. But, Caputo said "It's a matter of taste and style. Our target audience is not just our intellectual peers but also Joe and Jane average who don't read The Nation or whatever. We're trying to be more accesible.

A second alternative UMass paper is The People's Forum. Produced by the Radical Student Union, 10,000 copies of the first 8 page issue will be out today. Bandy said the The People's Forum lost funding when they decided not to become a part of the Student Business Office in an attempt to "maintain autonomy and avoid the beurocracy." As a result of this, she said, advertising by student organizations, such as the Distinguished Visitor's Program, was not allowed by the SAO. The SAO handles allocation of funds by all RSOs.

The money in the SAO office is not accessible as the SAO claims it should be, she said.

Caputo denied that the Weekly News was as tangled in manipulation as the rest of the world's media by it's insistance on looking for lies in everything.

"We are very young people with a very small chance of living to old age," he said. "You don't have to look for the lies, they're everywhere. And this is our creative response. We're not going down without a fight and in the meantime it makes living a lot of fun.

"Now, there's peace breaking out all over, but there's still the uprising in El Salvador, what was happening in China and the recent Panama sham. It's not so much how many topics we have to put in the paper, as it is a question of editing and money, especially money. If we had a rich patron we could launch a full scale magazine."

The Weekly News will have a table set up in the Campus Concourse and its twelfth issue will be out on the stands on Thursday.

BLACK AFFAIRS

Students choose CCEMBS first

By TANYA R. WILSON
Collegian Correspondent

Starting out in such a large school as the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, there are so many things you must be concerned about. One big worry students seem to have, is finding classes that fit their needs and ability.

Students need guidance to help make it easier on themselves and take away some of the unwanted stress. This is when they can turn to the various guidance offices. For example, there is CASIAC or advisors in the department of your major, and then there is the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other minority students (CCEMBS).

CCEMBS is a place where minority students can go to receive several forms of assistance, according to participants. CCEMBS has a variety of counselors, whom the students feel they can see at any time. Some students said they feel closer to CCEMBS advisors because they don't have to wait in line and take a number or put their names on a list with twenty million people ahead of them.

The advisors will help each and every student. A majority of the time, two students may have the same problem, and can work it out with each other as well as the advisor.

Chris, a student at UMass who is in the CCEMBS program, said, "I chose CCEMBS over CASIAC because I felt more comfortable, and didn't really know what CASIAC was."

"When I first got here I didn't have a major," Chris said. "I went to CCEMBS, they made calls to different departments and took time to help me get into the major I wanted."

CCEMBS has a summer program for minority students to help them get ahead and start adapting to college life. The program consists of new students taking classes for credit, and social gatherings so students do not feel alone when they enter the University.

Susan, who is also a student at UMass who attends CCEMBS, felt CCEMBS helped her prepare for college. "CCEMBS summer program helped me a lot. I got to meet different people and understood what was expected of me from my courses and wasn't as nervous to enter college," she said.

Heather, another student at UMass who did not go to the summer program but attends CCEMBS, said, "CASIAC is there when I need them," but she tends to choose to go to CCEMBS first because "I don't feel pressured by the advisors."

Heather said, when she first came to the university, her mind was boggled and she did not know where to begin. She said she went to CCEMBS and when she left, her mind was at ease. This in turn, she said, gave her the feeling if she needed help with anything she could rely on CCEMBS. She said she felt they understood her ability and didn't pressure her to take more or less of a course load than she could handle.

A number of participants in the program said CCEMBS does a great deal more than just advise students about academic issues, they help students look toward their futures. In the past CCEMBS has arranged job fairs and a variety of events that pertain to students' interest. These are just a few reasons students make their choice of guidance counselors from CCEMBS.

Do your homework

Don't be an enemy of the public

When I read the article "Fight the Anti-Semitism" in the Collegian dated February 6, 1990, I couldn't help laughing at the author's style of writing and the lack of knowledge of his subject. You must have spent a total of five minutes researching the article, considering the level of ignorance and incognizance in it.

What is the problem with a group of Afro-American men considering themselves Pro-Black? In your eyes does Pro-Blackism constitute anti-semitism? I wonder. Or is Public Enemy's message the thing that frightens you, and all those Jewish defense organizations? Let's take into account that Public Enemy's message is geared to Afro-American society, something which you and these various organizations lack. If only you could try to see life through their eyes, or the eyes of an Afro-American who has been a victim of a society that is not set up for the Afro-American to succeed in!

Reading further on down the article, still laughing at this grotesque piece of work, I stumbled upon your reference to Richard "Professor Griff" Griffin, who is currently the "Supreme Allied Chief of Community Relations" and not the "Minister of Information," as you claimed. We are all entitled to our opinion, and you mentioned that 'fact' in your article. So why the riff over Griff's opinion or belief? The views and opinion of Professor Griff are his own, and not those of the group Public Enemy. Then you move to mention that their next album is Welcome to the Terrordome. This is not the correct title for their upcoming album. To correct you on that, their next album is titled Fear of a Black Planet. "Welcome to the Terrordome" is the first release off their new album, which you mentioned contained "blatantly anti-semitic" lyrics.

REGGIE PERRY

If you had done a little extra curricular reading you might have learned something about the lyrics that you refer to. If that's too much, how about a little television? These forms of communication would have informed you of some important facts which you have missed. I mentioned those mediums because if you bother to pick up the February issue of Spin magazine, you'd learn a thing or two. I guess you missed NBC Nightly News last week, where Carlton Ridenhour (Chuck D.) appeared and explained phrase for phrase what he was stressing in the lyrics that you refer to as "blatantly anti-semitic."

The lyrics are "Crucifiction ain't no fiction/ So called chosen, frozen/Apology made to whoever please/ Still they got me like Jesus." The following is a quote from Chuck D. out of Spin magazine, February, 1990: "Somebody said that I was legitimizing Hitler's excuse for the exterminating of the Jews, by that old Christian belief that the Jews killed Jesus. It was the Romans who killed Jesus, not the Jews. When I say 'so called chosen', I'm not insulting Jews. I'm questioning the right of any people to think of themselves as the chosen. When I say 'frozen' that's not an anti-semitic remark. It just means that they were appalled and it stopped them in their tracks when the Washington Times interview came out. No question. If you look at the next line, it says 'Apology made to whoever pleases'. And I did apologize- those remarks weren't in the character for Public Enemy. But I still got crucified (by the media)."

I was glad to see you recognized the similarities between Public Enemy, Malcolm X, and Minister Louis Farrakhan. You recognized that those individuals want empowerment for Black people. When you look to quote one of our Black leaders, be sure you quote him correctly. We'll gain empowerment, equality, and whatever else we have coming to us "by any means necessary" and not "by any means possible."

Next time you choose an assignment or you tackle an assignment handed to you, I suggest you keep your biased opinions to the editorial page and not the arts and living section. Also, I suggest you choose a topic where your knowledge of the subject is vast, because this author's knowledge of Public Enemy is quite vast indeed.

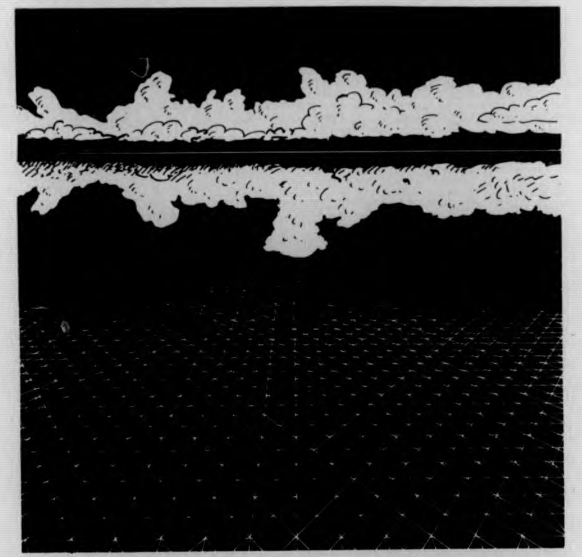
WHAT'S THE FUTURE HOLD?



One thing's for sure. It will be more complicated. Nowhere is that more true than in the world electronics market. At Teradyne, we're ready for whatever the future brings. Our technological edge spans several businesses, all critical to tomorrow's products.

In our Automatic Test equipment businesses, we're a leading player in virtually every market, from board test to component test. When you need to test the latest product, you talk to Teradyne first.

Our Electronic Design Automation business is bringing our technology to market in this fast growing software arena, producing state-of-the-art products used in engineering design analysis and test of complex electronic systems.

We're also the world's largest merchant producer of backplane connection systems. These systems are vital in the development of tomorrow's military and commercial electronics products.

And, Teradyne is the world's leading independent manufacturer of telephone network test systems. As voice and data merge, we'll be there to provide test solutions for the telecommunications industry.

To stay one step ahead of the future, we need talented people with new ideas, and the initiative to use them. Teradyne has facilities in some of the country's most desirable areas, and close to most of the nation's major learning centers.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Does UMass recognize labor rights of GEO?

"The Administration is conducting good faith discussions with the Graduate Employee Organization, which it assumes speaks for graduate employees. While discussions are going on, it would be inappropriate to meet with subgroups of the GEO." (Provost Richard O'Brien as quoted in the Collegian.

The good news is that Provost O'Brien has decided to recognize the GEO as a representative of the graduate employees. The bad news is that he's going about it all wrong.

The problem is that O'Brien has apparently decided that he should negotiate with the GEO as the sole representative of the graduate employees and that his discussions with the GEO are sufficient in covering all discussions with subgroups of graduate employees.

One of the GEO's goals is getting recognition as the representative of the graduate employees. So what's the problem?

The problem is protection from the capriciousness of the administration. If they unilaterally choose to recognize the GEO today, with the threat of a possible strike hanging over them, then they could also choose to rescind this recognition as soon as the threat is removed.

The only acceptable choice is that the administration agree to a binding recognition process, just like all the other employees at Umass have. This would be a procedure whereby the graduate employees could vote to select (or not select) a negotiating agent. Once the recognition process is in place, the university is obligated to recognize and negotiate with the agent selected.

There are several reasons that graduate students doubt that they can trust the administration without such a binding agreement.

UMass imposed several new fees this semester. One of them, the $400 curriculum fee, is really a disguised form of tuition. It pays directly for Teaching Assistant and Associate (TA) salaries.

Bruce Leban

Each TA pays a fee which is then used to pay their salary. Most graduate students view that as a pay cut. (An actual tuition increase would have been included in the graduate student tuition waiver.)

In a letter to the GEO dated January 31, 1990, O'Brien and Chancellor Duffey said that they would provide a full curriculum fee waiver to all TA's who met certain income requirements. Yet in a February 5 letter distributed to all graduate students, they said that they would guarantee a full waiver to American TA's only.

It seems that the administration does not intend to live up to its original promise which included both American and non-American TA's.

In addition, while speaking at a GEO membership meeting last semester, O'Brien said he would recognize the GEO if he could but that he wasn't legally allowed to. In the January 31 letter, after learning that it is possible to recognize the GEO, O'Brien and Duffey said they would not recognize the GEO because they do not think it is in its best interests.

The graduate students, such as myself, want a simple guarantee from the administration: that we can negotiate with them fairly, knowing that what they promise us today will not be denied tomorrow.

Universities like to pretend that graduate students are given assistantships as a form of financial aid or benevolent paternalism on the part of the university. The fact is that graduate student employees are essential to a university. Many Teaching "Assistants" don't assist at all - they teach. Without TA's, it would be virtually impossible for a university to teach many of its courses.

The thousands of graduate student employees at UMass are both students and employees. It is possible for us to collectively negotiate with the university on employment related matters without jeopardizing the educational relationship. The fact that O'Brien is now involved in discussions with the GEO is proof enough of that fact.

The only reasonable action on the part of the administration is to agree to a recognition process.

Bruce Leban is a UMass graduate student and employee

Hamburglar robs future

In the early 70s, children kept busy with role-playing fantasy games like "cops and robbers." Today they play "fast-food restaurant."

As advertised in Toys R Us and Child World flyers, Fisher Price toys and McDonald's restaurants have recently collaborated on an educational project. Now, for the first time, youngsters can live out their dreams and see what life is like behind a McDonald's countertop.

Darren Garnick

For profit-oriented brats who have outgrown lemonade stands:

- McDonald's Restaurant Center, $89.99. Features a drive-through window, walk-up counter, cash register, complete kitchen facilities, and food storage units. Food not included.
- McDonald's Happy Meal, $10.99. Includes fake burger, fries, drink, and toy surprise. All in a reusable box!
- McDonald's Crew Uniform, $9.99. Authentic replica apron, visor, and name tag. One size fits all.
- McDonald's Entrees, 5.99. Choose plastic Big Mac, Chicken McNuggets, or Garden Salad.
- McDonald's Soda Fountain, 29.99. Dispenses psuedo-milkshakes and pseudo-softdrinks.

If mommy or daddy splurges and buys enough uniforms for a crew of five, a McDonald's franchise can be installed in the rec room for about $169.73. But let's be realistic. A toy restaurant needs pretend food to maintain its pretend clientele.

Stocking five of each plastic entree plus three Happy Meals will run up an additional $122.82 bill. Ironically, the cost of the play food far exceeds the cost of the real stuff. A legitimate Big Mac, for instance, is approximately $1.90 versus $5.99 for the Fisher Price version.

The plastic food, however, does taste better.

Toy store prices aside, the inherent danger in these Mcfantasy games is sociological. Children should be pretending to be journalists, teachers, astronauts or desert explorers.

Healthy imaginations should run rampant. With the help of a vivid imagination, piles of leaves become quicksand . . . mud becomes a secret chemical formula to neutralize acid rain.

The Happy Meal Generation clearly has no imagination. They will not achieve world peace because they will be unable to dream of it.

Eavesdropping on the local playground scene, we find that "fast-food restaurant" has caught on with the kids . . .

"No, Sam. I want to be the cashier. You were the cashier last time!"

"Damn it, Susie. You've been playing with that Happy Meal box for two hours! Give someone else a turn."

Set low goals for the kiddies, and they are guaranteed to achieve them. Forget the junior chemistry sets and Nerf footballs, what every boy and girl in this country wants and needs is a spatula.

The American public, of course, passively accepts these new trends. Why is no one outraged? Where is Ralph Nader? Jesse Jackson? Alan Dershowitz? And why is Ted Koppel suddenly hush-hush?

Clearly, there is some kind of cover-up.

These toys threaten our nation's future. If we continue to socialize our children to dream of flipping burgers, the United States will not be able to economically compete with a laundromat.

Clouds of fiscal chaos rise

A time will come in humanity's social evolution when it is recognized that the greatest transfer of wealth in "civilized" history, from the poor and middle class workers of the world to the wealthy and privileged few, has taken place in the last decade. At the forefront of this march into the jungle of Social Darwinism has been America. In true spirit of the pioneer, our government continues to explore new frontiers, finding new and ingenious ways to funnel wealth and resources to few, while sending the bill to the American worker.

Stephen Moore

This has culminated in a situation where the American people owe almost one-half billion dollars per day in interest payments alone and almost three trillion dollars giving rise to that interest.

Two recent examples of this are especially notable; the Savings and Loan industry bailout, and the shifting of the tax burden from graduated income taxes of Social Security taxes. Poor management and corruption in the S & L industry cost hundreds of billions of dollars to investors, and the American taxpayers are covering the bill.

Where is the money now? Very likely, much of it is lining the pockets of the same executives and officials who presided over the collapse of the industry. Likewise, savings which are granted to the wealthy by cuts in income taxes, are paid through the increased costs which Social Security taxes place upon the poor and middle classes.

The justification for the increase in SS taxes earlier this decade was that it would create a surplus to help prepare for greater demand when the baby-boomers came of age. Instead, by covering billions of dollars of debt with "off budget" taxes, our government officials perpetuate the illusion of fulfilling the deficit reduction requirements,insuring that the lower classes assume a greater burden for the routine operation of government.

Of course, this is but the tip of the proverbial iceberg. How much will graft and corruption of Reagan Administration HUD officials cost American taxpayers? How much have we lost to price-gouging in the Defense Industry? What will it cost if the Bush Administration succeeds in passing a capital-gains tax cut this year? Who will foot the bill? Perhaps most importantly, what is it that the privileged few — the beneficiaries of his "legal robbery" — mainly share in common?.

It should be crystal clear that our current president, and his predecessor, have directly served the interests of the wealthy few. Each year sees new legislation which increases government support of the wealthy — socialism for the rich — while expanding the economic burden of the poor and middle classes — oligarchy for the masses. Perhaps the ultimate irony is that this has all been done in the name of Law and Order, in very pursuit of Democracy and the American Dream. As the propaganda machines paint a distorted picture, most folks are left blissfully ignorant of what is really happening. Meanwhile, our rights and freedoms trickle away into an endless sea of debt.

The legends of Valentines Day explored

By MARYANNE MARTIN
Collegian Correspondent

Today is Valentine's Day — a day for people to express love and affection for those special people in our lives. To some it might mean a quiet dinner, to others a card or a single rose.

It's also a time for us to remember our friends, relatives, and all of those we dearly love, by sending cards, baking cookies, or even just a phone call.

There is an exciting feeling about Valentine's Day. Your heart reaches out to remember someone, while also eagerly awaiting it's own remembrance.

But what is it that creates these feelings on Valentine's Day? Why do we honor a holiday which celebrates an emotion?

According to Samuel R. Delany, professor of Comparative Literature at the University of Massachusetts, any connection between a saint named Valentine and giving gifts or love letters is purely accidental.

"The one thing we can say for sure, at least in historical terms, is that these feelings in no way go back to either of the two Christian martyrs named Valentine," said Delany.

Delany said our present day celebration of Valentine's Day on Feb. 14 may have stemmed from the intertwinement of at least three historical legends - two secular, one religious.

The ancient Romans, Delany said, celebrated a festival on Feb. 15 called the Lupercalia. Young women offered themselves to be lashed by the sacred whip of a priest, believing it would make them more fertile, he said.

"The festival probably survived in some form or other well into Mideval times," Delany said.

A separate belief, stemming from the early Middle Ages, was an old notion that birds began to mate on Feb. 14.

"You can understand how people thought that this might apply to human beings as well," Delany said.

The most familiar of the Valentine's day legends, however, is the tale of the infamous St. Valentine, put to death on Feb. 14 in 269 A.D, Delaney said. According to most historical reports, Emperor Claudius II outlawed marriage because the Roman Empire needed soldiers and it was believed that married men would not make good soldiers.

Legends say the kindly Valentine secretly married many young couples and was discovered. As a result, in 496 A.D., Pope Gelasius I named Feb. 14 Saint Valentine's Day - a church feastday, Delany said.

However, today, because of historical inconsistencies, the celebration is entirely secular, Delany said. In 1969, the Church dismissed many of it's saints. St. Bridget and St. Christopher, in addition to St. Valentine, were a few to name.

Basically, Delany believes people like the idea of winter holidays. "If you can put up tinsel or wear bright red hearts, it makes winter more bearable," he says.

A Valentine specialist tells all about the chaste saint

The strange and terrible history of the ceremonies for the annual treat

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Valentine's Day, named for the Roman Saint Valentine, is known as the day for love and flowers, romance and jewelry, friendship and greeting cards.

But this is purely accidental, according to Frank Staff, author of The Valentine and Its Origins, published in 1969.

While historical reports differ, Staff said "St. Valentine was known to be a very chaste man, never concerned with cupids and hearts, the mating of birds, or with lovers."

Valentine was a holy priest in Rome during the reign of Emperor Claudius II. When Valentine refused to denounce his faith, the Emperor ordered him to be beaten with clubs and beheaded. Valentine's Day marks his execution on Feb. 14, 270.

Staff said Valentine's accidental association with love occurred several years after his death. Because Valentine was subject to fits of epilepsy during his lifetime, people believed he was the saint who could cure that disease. In some parts of Germany, epilepsy was referred to as "Valentine's sickness."

From this association, Valentine also became known as the saint to cure melancholy and "the falling sickness," or falling in love. Consequently, Valentine has been referred to as the Saint of Lovers since the late 17th century.

One of the most ancient customs associated with Valentine's Day is the Roman Spring festival "Lupercalia," which signified "the return of Spring when a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love and when the birds begin mating," Staff said.

However, men's fancy did not turn lightly during this ceremony, for this rite of fertility demanded that young men spread the blood of sacrificed animals on their foreheads, then run naked down the street, slashing at young women with knives. These women did nothing to avoid the attacks, but offered themselves to the men, according to Staff.

Today's more familiar custom of sending greeting cards and hand-made valentines did not develop until the 18th century in Germany. Prior to this time, people gave their loved ones gifts, such as hand-carved wooden spoons. During the 18th century, people began to send verses written on elaborately decorated parchment, paper hearts and doilies, and pictures of birds and flowers.

By the 19th century in America, several companies had made a business out of producing Valentine's Day greeting cards, although many people still hand-made their valentines, according to Staff.

Several University of Massachusetts students said they continue to observe Valentine's Day traditions.

UMass junior physics major Cate Dean said she bought and sent greeting cards to her parents, brothers, and sisters.

"I sometimes make valentines, but I happened to see good cards in the stores this year," Dean said.

UMass sophomore business major Dan Widen said he sent a card to his girlfriend, and bought her a jewelry box as well.

UMass junior journalism major Stuart Hanford said he usually buys greeting cards for his valentines. "I used to make cards in elementary school, but now I buy them," he said.

LAURIE: WHEN LOVE beckons to you, follow him, though his ways are hard and steep. And when his wings enfold you, yield to him, though the sword hidden among his pinions may wound you. And when he speaks to you believe in him, though his voice may shatter your dreams as the North Wind lays waste the garden...Love gives naught but itself and takes naught but from itself. Love possesses not nor would be possessed; For love is sufficient unto love. Love has no other desire but to fulfill itself. But if you love and must needs have desires, let these be your desires: To melt and be like a running brook that sings its melody to the night. To know the pain of too much tenderness. To be wounded by your own understanding of love; and to bleed willingly and joyfully. To wake at dawn with a winged heart and give thanks for another day of loving; To rest at the noon hour and meditate love's ecstasy; To return home at eventide with gratitude; and then to sleep with a prayer for the beloved in your heart and a song of praise upon your lips. - Faithfully and lovingly submitted. Kevin

EL AMOR SE EXPRESA de muchas maneras a veces en silencio, otras con alborozo; es un sentimiento dificil de definir. El amor es comprender cada pequeno detalle; una sonrisa, una mirada, la alegria de estar juntos, un beso, y un abrazo. El amor es algo muy especial, muy preciado. Y a medida que crece, con el tiempo encuentras que nada te puedad mas felicidad en la vida. Te amo por ser como eres, y porque me has hecho muy feliz. Feliz dia de los enamorados MI AMOR TE AMO Lissette

Rippopotamus offers rip-roaring rock 'n' roll

By LINDA WOODS
Collegian Correspondent

No matter how I spend Valentine's Day it never lives up to its flowery, rosy cheek, cheruby reputation. But, I am pleased to say that this year I have found a welcome solution to my Valentine's disillusionment at the Hatch; a band called Rippopotamus.

Surely the Hatch is not the most romantic spot. And perhaps it is difficult to get rosy red thinking about a band whose name you will inevitably either laugh at or mispronounce. Well, be assured, Rippopotamus comes with a guarantee: "We will funk you." I ask you, what better way to spend Valentine's Day?

Rippopotamus, comprised of five chronologically aligned Amherst residents (ages ranging consecutively from 23-27), will be at the Hatch tonight to prove that they can make you dance.

Lead singer Nic Tyler views the band as predominantly dance oriented, explaining, "I like to dance. I am most impressed by bands I can dance to."

Can he dance! Rippopotamus has a way of setting an audience in motion under the lead of Tyler. With James Brown footwork, Motown hip sways and a lot of Solid Gold, Tyler has that Dance Fever.

"I have seen a lot of bands come through the Valley," says Tyler. He prides Rippopotamus with possessing a sound that is neither the "joke band specializing in social satire," nor is it a "screw-the-establishment, college radio, garage band."

Tyler adds, "Being a singer, I want material that is going to communicate with people first." Rippopotamus achieves this with the members' varied, collected knowledge of music as well as a keen sense of just what people want to hear.

Although hesitant to classify their sound by citing influences, drummer Rich Gordon says, "Rippopotamus is our interpretation of funk through the influences of Motown, George Clinton, Sly and the Family Stone, Fishbone and Led Zeppelin."

If that last name seems somewhat out of place then you haven't heard Rippopotamus' funk Led Zeppelin medley. It has impressed as many Zeppelin fans as it has offended. Also not to be missed is the band's version of "Whole Lotto Luv" — spelling by Gordon.

So, what about the "uptight White boy funk" stereotype? Guitarist Dainis Kaulenas explains, "To five suburban White boys, funk doesn't come easily. We have done our homework." Homework which includes a lot of original songwriting. "We have our influences but we are doing our own thing. We aren't ripping anybody off right now. The songs just come," says Kaulenas.

A lot of good things have been coming to Rippopotamus. From the band Fifth Business came Gordon, drummer extraordinaire, and the most recent addition, Russ Bogartz on trombone. The trombone has become an intregal part of Rippopotamus' sound.

They are the only local band I know of (Bim Ska la Bim doesn't count) that takes full advantage of the trombone's wailing sound on almost every tune. On those rare occasions when Bogartz isn't playing trombone, he takes on the role of "Mr. Utility Player," filling in on keyboards, percussion and generally "jamming all over the place," says Kaulenas adding, "We have the only classically trained funk, fusion, rapping trombonist in the world. Russ has been an amazing addition to the band."

Bogartz says, "There is a wealth of creative thought brought into a harmonically simple genre. How could I pass it up?"

Put all these factors together, add in Bill Rohan's funky bass, and you have a band that falls somewhere on the groove spectrum between the hard edge of the Red Hot Chili Peppers and the sweet moves of Simply Red (no Valentine's Day puns intended).

To experience this band is to gain invaluable knowledge of the Rippopotamus, that mysterious creature which the band defines as "the huge, lumbering behemoth that grooves." So, don't let the Valentine's Day heat pass you by.

He drives Miss Daisy, like no one else

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Staff

If all good things come in twos, Morgan Freeman and Jessica Tandy are a lock for Best Actor and Best Actress honors at this year's Academy Awards. Loosely based upon the experiences of his own grandmother, Alfred Uhry's play, Driving Miss Daisy received wide critical acclaim and a Pulitzer Prize for its handling of prejudice and social change. The film, adapted by Uhry and directed by Bruce Beresford, takes the underlying themes and opens them up by embodying them in the performances of Freeman and Tandy. The result is a profoundly moving examination of a beguiling relationship as a lesson in humility and acceptance.

Tandy plays a highly independent, 72-year-old Southern Jewish matron who manages to avoid injury after crashing her 1948 Packard into her neighbor's rose garden. Fearing for her future safety, her businessman son (played by Dan Aykroyd in a wonderful performance) goes against her ardent wishes and hires a chauffeur (Freeman). As an act of retaliation, Tandy refuses to accept Freeman's constant efforts to do his job. It isn't until Freeman drives alongside her as she defiantly walks into town that she accepts a ride, thus beginning a friendship that spans 25 years.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Tandy and Freeman ultimately grow together out of a difference of awareness rather than a sense of minority bonding. Freeman is able to come to terms with being a victim of prejudice while Tandy isn't. When the local temple is bombed, Tandy angrily questions the action while Freeman takes it as another reminder of the way things are. It's this very testing of differences and similarities that fuses their friendship.

The two eventually become metaphors for the struggle for Civil Rights. Tandy's last-minute invitation to join her at a banquet honoring Maritn Luther King is rejected by Freeman; his dignity as a black man refuses such patronizing. When he angrily tells her she should've asked him in advance, Tandy's stubborn streak and short temper cloud her understanding of what he expects as common decency. Tandy's financial status enabled her to avoid the brunt of minority oppression that Freeman no doubt experienced his whole life. Her pride was by virtue of a sheltered upbringing while Freeman's was forged by a struggle for survival.

Driving Miss Daisy is by no means a cinematic masterpiece but it does stand as a wonderful testament to the art of acting.

A lifeless Life and Fate

Among numerous other atrocities committed by the Nazis during World War II was the internment of Russian Jews in ghettos where they lived in squalor until they were executed. Life in a ghetto was a nightmare. All the necessities of life were in short supply and if one stepped out of line for any reason he would be shot. Worse than the lack of material goods was the loss of spirit many suffered as a result of the constant persecution.

The only character in the one-act play, Life and Fate, performed at Smith College, was such a person. She was a doctor who spent her free time writing letters to her son who was free. As the play opens, she is writing a final letter to her son because she knows she is going to be executed.

In the letter she tells her son of some of her most poignant memories of life in the ghetto. In one, she tells her son of a young boy who was shot in the shoulder for chasing a ball under the barbed wire. The children of the ghetto are a great concern to her and she writes her son that when she sees them running and playing on the way to school it chills her blood because children are supposed to be the future, but they have no future.

While this story is emotional, most of the others are without spark and boring. The doctor was competently, but not convincingly, played by Deborah Lubar. The play is essentially a monologue, and a good monologue is maintained by arresting the attention of the audience with its material and with its telling. The material was obvious and common. A play such as this should have had no trouble finding fascinating and riveting material to portray Holocaust horrors. Instead, the play was a lifeless, bland play about a subject which should have been much more interesting.

— RAYMOND MARTIN

High culture intensity from Tokyo

By SEAN T. O'CONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

Marking their 20th Anniversary Season, the Tokyo String Quartet, acclaimed as one of the greatest quartets in history, performed to a sold-out audience at Bowker Auditorium Saturday.

Since 1969 they've toured extensively, accomplishing the feat of having performed over 2,000 concerts on five continents. The Tokyo String Quartet has reached their level of notoriety due to the combined talents of violinists Peter Oundjian and Kikuei Ikeda, violist Kazuhide Isomura, and cellist Sadao Harada.

Joining as their special guest was guitar virtuoso Kazuhito Yamashita who is known as one of the foremost classical guitarists of our day. Performing with brilliant technique and expression, he has gained the praises of audiences, critics, and fellow artists such as the famed flutist James Galway.

The quartet's magnificent program was comprised of Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, Verdi's String Quartet in E minor, Boccherini's Quintet No. 6 in G major, Puccini's Crisantemi, concluding with Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Quintet, Op. 143.

Proving the results of their lifelong dedication to chamber music, the Tokyo performed with such a dazzling combination of technical wizardry and emotional intensity as to literally elicit gasps from the audience. Seemingly without effort they created a variety of musical textures and moods.

Guitarist Yamashita's impassioned playing in Boccherini's Quintet No. 6 in G major and Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Quintet, Op. 143, combined to create a graceful balance.

Their performance was appreciated with a standing ovation, as the Tokyo returned to perform the final movement of Boccherini's Quintet No. 4 in D major which demonstrated more of their dynamic technique, bringing the piece and performance to a startling and powerful finish. Chamber music at it's finest — Tokyo String Quartet.

MR. VICE PRESIDENT, WOULD YOU AGREE THAT MR. BUSH'S TRIP TO THE COLOMBIAN DRUG CONFERENCE IS FOOLISH AND UNNECESSARY?
NOT AT ALL...
THE PRESIDENT JUST ISN'T ONE TO RUN AWAY FROM A FIGHT. NOT THAT HE HAS ANYTHING TO PROVE IN THAT DEPARTMENT. HE DOESN'T! HE WAS A DECORATED NAVAL AVIATOR DURING THE BIG ONE!
BUT I CAN TELL YOU, AS A VIETNAM-ERA VETERAN MYSELF, SOMETIMES A MAN'S GOTTA DO WHAT A MAN'S GOTTA DO!
WHAT WAS IT YOU HAD TO DO, SIR?
WELL, SOMETIMES THE GUYS WOULD DARE ME TO GO AWOL FOR BREWSKIS.

NO, YOU NEED YOUR SLEEP. C'MON.
CAN I JUST WATCH ANOTHER 15 MINUTES? PLEASE?? OK, JUST 10 MINUTES! THEN I'LL GO STRAIGHT TO BED! FIVE MINUTES! JUST FIVE MINUTES, OK?
TURN OFF THE TV.
LOOK, I'LL JUST WATCH A FEW MORE COMMERCIALS, OK? SEE, HERE'S MY FAVORITE GUM COMMERCIAL!
I GUESS THAT GOT PRETTY PATHETIC.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Shopping bargains abound today. Avoid going overboard. A new acquaintance could be the key to your making a career change. Do not rush into a personal relationship if you have any qualms.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Fresh starts enjoy favorable influences. Your best rapport is with a trusted associate. Past projects can be recycled to earn new profits. Seek advice from those who know you best.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Some soul-searching will help you find the answer to a perplexing problem. Your earning power is greater than ever, thanks to your new hightech skills. Conferences and interviews should go like clockwork.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Ride with the tide and good things will happen. A professional relationship means more than you dreamed possible. A stock market tip could bring sudden good fortune. Things shape up nicely in romance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Working quietly behind the scenes will lead to a promotion. Good news arrives from an unusual quarter. Get agreements in writing. You will reap handsome profits when a creative idea catches on.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): On-the-spot decisions prove advantages. Meet a problem involving neighbors or friends head-on. Romance is tender and meaningful. Loved one shares a delightful surprise.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Do not let someone's accusations upset you. You know you are right! You get a lucky break if you are looking for an apartment or condo. A loved one could be feeling neglected. Plan a special treat.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Save time and money by approaching a difficult task methodically. Delegate more responsibility. A meeting that takes place today could lead to new romance or business. Exercise helps relieve tension.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Being in the spotlight is both delightful and confusing. You may be too busy to discern someone's motives. Let romantic partners handle their own affairs. Refuse to be used by anyone.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Listen to experts and ask for suggestions concerning your career or finances. Surprising events are in store. Do not assume the worst before you have all the facts. You could hit the jackpot!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A good day to apply for loans and ask for favors. Today's work sets the stage for tomorrow's success. Do not allow a professional or romantic relationship to drift along – nail thing down.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A lively discussion could jump-start some constructive changes. A raise or promotion is possible. Be careful how you word letters and memos; they could be misconstrued. Pursue romance.

with that. Out of the pool, Michele is not what I would consider to be the ideal type of captain.

"That's where Keira comes in, they counter-set each other very well. Michele does her things, Keira does hers and it all works out for the best."

"I, myself look up to Michele and the other seniors on the team," Cruz said. "They [the seniors] are great swimmers and they are always there for the support. They look to me because I get them psyched for the meets. Michele is a big leader, because of the way that she swims. She [Michele] is like a mother on the team.

"I don't think that Michele really wanted the title of captain, because of all the pressure she is under," said Cruz.

Leary's loss is Cruz's gain. "I wanted to be captain but as a sophomore I didn't expect it. Maybe there is more of a reality senior year, but I'm happy with it, I'm not gonna shy it away. I don't go around announcing that I'm captain, it's just a title."

The New England championships are set for Saturday in Rhode Island, and just as sure as the sun always rises in the morning, Keira Cruz will be participating this weekend. "We are hoping to place second to Boston College this year, we just missed it last year," Cruz said. "It's gonna be fun, we had a good time last year. Everyone's going to swim fast."

For Cruz, she is very close to qualifying for the Easterns in Pennsylvania coming up at the end of February. If Cruz does qualify, it will be in the 50- and/or the 100-meter freestyle.

Cruz and Newcomb disagree as to what Cruz should be swimming. Cruz claims that her best event is the 50-meter free, and while Newcomb does not disagree with this, he feels that Cruz would be a great 200-meter freestyler.

Besides being a great team leader, Cruz is an excellent swimmer. Like Larry Bird, Magic Johnson, and Mario Lemieux, all who are the best players on their respective teams, Cruz is one of the best swimmers for the Minutewomen, and therefore earned the title of captain.

"Keira has the potential to be one of the top athletes to come out of this program," Newcomb said. "She has not yet reached her potential and it will probably take her the next two years to do so."

As the saying goes, "if the shoe fits, wear it". Keira Cruz wears the shoes of captain for the Minutewomen.

Women's hoop ends skid with 78-74 win

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The drought is over. After 26 days and nine straight defeats the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team finally got to taste the thrill of victory last night when they defeated Harvard 78-74 at Briggs Athletic Center.

"It feels great," said a jubilent coach Kathy Hewelt. "We played intelligent basketball for two halves. That's why we won."

UMass assumed its final lead of the night, 75-74, when Helen Freeman (game-high 20 points) scored a hoop with just 38 seconds remaining. Patty Robak then hit both ends of a one-and-one with 12 seconds left. Harvard failed on its trip down and was forced to foul Freeman, who hit the front end of her one-and-one to provide the final score.

It was clear that to get back to winning UMass would have to find a balanced attack on offense. And that's what happened. Using just seven players, the Minutewomen had five people score in double figures. In addition to Freeman's 20, Robak scored 16, Sue Serafini 14, Keyburn McCusker 13 and Michele Pytko 10.

"We had balanced scoring tonight," said Hewelt. "That was a big key for us."

Behind 33-31 at the half, Harvard came out strong in the second half and took a 43-42 lead at the 13:38 mark. A little over two minutes later, behind Jen Mazanec's strong play, Harvard seized its biggest lead of the second half, 52-46.

Serafini started the UMass comeback by draining a three-pointer at the 10:00 mark. "That was a big shot for us," said UMass assistant coach Mary Vail. "It started us on a roll."

Robak then scored six of the Minutewomen's next 11 points to give UMass a two-point lead, 60-58, with under seven minutes to play in the game.

"She's [Robak] a zone buster," said Hewelt. "We were able to get her the ball and they just kept letting her shoot."

UMass started out the game like a team possessed with getting a win. They jumped out quickly in the first seven minutes to an 18-6 lead. But Harvard had cut the lead to 28-19 by the 6:25 mark, on its way to trailing at the half by just a basket.

Women's Hoop Notebook: After struggling for much of the season freshman Robak has started to play the type of basketball Hewelt expected from her when she recruited her to UMass. She's had a string of good games in recent weeks. "She seems to be more comfortable coming off the bench," said Vail. Robak was moved to the bench in favor of Lisa Hair over the intersession . . . Serafini continues to be on a roll from the three-point line. Last night she stroked 4-8 from behind the line . . .

Men's gymnastics coasts past SC

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

With the overall outcome of last night's men's gymnastics meet between the University of Massachusetts and the University of Southern Connecticut never in doubt, all that remained was for gymnasts from UMass and Southern to show off their individual talents.

Although the Minutemen took a 261.3-184.1 decision at Boyden Gymnastics Center to raise their record to 5-3, their minds were clearly focused on Sunday's meet at Temple.

"We had a strong performance tonight, which is important before Temple," junior Dave DiNucci said. "We want to be ready for that meet — hopefully we can go in there and get some good scores and win the meet."

"We have to be psyched up for Temple and keep going up and up from there," said senior co-captain Bart Balocki.

Last night was the Minutemen's final home date, with four regular season road meets before the New England championships on March 10.

"We always get pumped up for the road — we know it's always going to be a tough meet away from home," Balocki said. "We have to win on the road to place well in the EIGL's (Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League)."

Although the injury-plagued Owls were no threat to UMass as a team, junior Hector Salazar took first in all-around competition with a score of 55.1, ahead of senior teammate Carlton Noble, who scored 53.55. UMass freshman Steve Christensen finished third, totalling 53.2.

As if winless Southern Connecticut hasn't had a hapless enough season, junior Shawn Simpson scratched from the meet after three events, because of the flu and a nagging heel injury. Simpson had already scored a 9.3 on floor and an 8.65 on rings.

"It's difficult when we have to take a lot of zeros (not being able to put up six competitors for an event) — we took six tonight," Noble said.

Noble, Salazar, and Simpson have had to concentrate on individual goals because of Southern's poor season. "I hope to qualify for the NCAA championships as an individual," Noble said. "I hope to do better there than I did last season, because this is my last shot."

"I was pretty happy with my performance tonight, although I had a few bobbles," Christensen said. "This was my cleanest routine on pommel horse this season — I haven't really gone through it without any breaks before."

Christensen's 9.4 was a meet high for pommel horse, in an event that has given UMass trouble throughout the season.

Sophomore Cal Booker scored a 9.55 on his floor routine, edging out the Salazar (9.5). "I was sick before, so I was just happy to get through my routines," Booker said.

Balocki was also happy with his routine on high bar (9.35), another sometimes bugaboo for UMass. "I finally hit my high bar routine tonight — I've missed it every other meet this season," Balocki said.

"We got what we were going after tonight, winning some individual events," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "I think we can keep going up from here."

The Minutemen will have to keep on their upward path to beat Temple, a team which has been averaging 265 points this season.

"I think we'll do well for Temple," DiNucci said. "It will be a higher level of gymnastics — we'll just have to better our level of competition."

Women's swimming team finds a leader in Keira Cruz

Captain as a sophomore

Sophomore Keira Cruz has stepped into the leadership role as captain of the women's swim team this season.

Collegian Staff

CAPTAIN; defined by The American Heritage Dictionary as, "one who commands, leads, or guides others."

When the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team looks for leadership, they look to sophomore captain Keira Cruz. "A captain is a representative of the team, someone that the team has a lot of faith and confidence in," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb.

"When you start the recruiting process, you pick out people that you really would like to have as part of your team," Newcomb said. "Keira was one of those people, she's a very highly motivated, self-assured, confident person who knows what she wants and she's going to go after it. You build a whole team of people and you would like people just like Keira."

Cruz turned down Rutgers University to come to UMass. In doing so, she ventured out of her home state (New Jersey).

"I made the right choice by coming to UMass," said Cruz. No one would argue with the young jubilant Cruz, affectionately nicknamed Dimples by her swim mates.

"I really didn't expect to be captain, it came as a surprise, I'm happy with it," Cruz said.

While the position of captain has its advantages, such as developing a close relationship with the coach, and being looked up to by teammates, Cruz points out that, "It's difficult being captain as a sophomore because I only have a year experience on the team, so I really don't know what they expect of me or what is expected of the captain."

"I'm very happy with the job that she [Keira] has done," Newcomb said. Cruz may be the appointed captain. However, Michele Leary must be considered the performance leader, because of her consistent ability to win her races.

"These two [Cruz and Leary] set off each other very well," Newcomb said. "Yes, Michele is definitely our performance leader, I don't think that anyone would argue

Afterthoughts of the Temple loss

I can breath easily again. My chest pains have subsided. My voice has returned. I am under control again.

But the pain from Sunday's Temple victory at The Cage lingers on like a slow burn. As Jim Clark so eloquently put it in Monday's Collegian, this one did indeed hurt. In fact, Sunday's 83-82 UMass loss hurt a lot. As coach John Calipari said so perceptively, "There's no moral victory in this loss."

Oh-so-true. UMass seemingly had this one in the bag on multiple occasions. Numerous times, in the hostile surroundings of The Cage on Sunday, I thought to myself, this is it . . . today's the day . . . surely we will end this 0-16 streak against the Owls.

But no, each time victory was securely in our grasp Temple would come back. The teams battled on like two prize fighters. Both afraid to lose. Both daring to win.

John Steven Marple

I should have known that whoever was to win this contest would get a little lucky. Just as I should have learned my lesson the last time the Minutemen played a Big Game in The Cage, that being the Connecticut game. In that game I singled out UConn guard Chris Smith as the object of my wrath. I taunted him from the beginning 'till the end. He ended up with 24 points, leading UConn to the W.

Yesterday I chose to verbally flog Mik Kilgore. I yelled numerous obscenities at him as well as extending my middle finger to welcome him to The Cage. One of my friends joined in my crusade and informed Kilgore quite loudly that if he wasn't smart enough to remember how to spell his name all need do is think of it as the name Kim spelled backwards.

Anyway, with the clock winding down in the first half the sly Cage faithful figured they'd fool good old Kim . . . er Mik, and trick him into shooting early by counting ahead of the clock. Presto, it worked like a charm. Thinking the clock was about to run out Mik pulled up from about 27 feet and let one fly. Too bad he nailed it. The joke was on us.

Temple and UMass ended regulation tied at 69. Take away that hoop by Mik and come to your own conclusions. UMass 69, Temple 66 seems to dance through my head.

Clearly this was a game UMass could have and probably should have one. William Herndon misses the second end of a 1-and-1 at the 1:00 mark in regulation; John Tate misses a tough layup in traffic in OT; Jim McCoy misfires on many occasions in OT, seemingly fouled on some of them but no whistle is heard. As each one of these occured my heart sank a little lower. I could sense victory slipping away.

But enter Rafer Giles to the rescue. He sticks a trey in the second OT to put UMass up 80-77 with 2:35 remaining. Oh-for-16 could now be kissed away for good. I jumped so high in the aisle that I almost fell on some hulk-like dude in front of me.

Free throws by Michael Harden and Donald Hodge tie the score. No need to fear, Rafer is here. He calmly sinks two free throws to give UMass an 82-80 lead with just 32 seconds left. Temple brings the ball up the floor . . . Harden comes free . . . he launches a trey right in front of the Umass bench and me in the stands . . . the damn thing goes in . . . 83-82 Temple victory.

After the game I am devastated. That shot by Harden runs in my mind over and over. He had no right to be that open. He had no right to take that shot when Temple was down just two points. He had no right to make it — it's common knowledge that outside shooting is not Michael Harden's strong suit.

Toward the end of the final OT I yelled out to one of the officials, "Hey ref, you better run when the game's over 'cause I'm gonna kill you!" But I've calmed down since Sunday's game. Now I simply want to chat with him. Perhaps I could bring an uzi.

Mt. Holyoke student busted for distributing LSD

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

A Mount Holyoke College student charged with distributing lysergic acid diethylamide was arraigned at the U.S. District Court in Springfield yesterday and released in the custody of her mother, who had signed a personal surety bond in the amount of $100,000.

A preliminary hearing is scheduled for March 26.

Lisa Woodrum, 22, of Poughkeepsie, N.Y., was arrested Tuesday in South Hadley by inspectors of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and Drug Enforcement Administration special agents. According to a press statement released yesterday from the U.S. Department of Justice, Woodrum was arrested after a complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Springfield charged her with distributing LSD.

In an affidavit filed against Woodrum, a U.S. postal inspector stated "[Woodrum] distributed four hundred doses of lysergic acid diethylamide to an individual in New York state on January 16, 1990."

The affidavit also said that "during the last year, Woodrum has received four Express Mail packages from a location in California known as a source area for LSD."

Officials from the college would not comment further than to say a student was arrested Tuesday for distributing controlled substances.

On Tuesday evening, Woodrum was arraigned before the U.S. Magistrate Michael Ponsor. She was released on personal recognizance on the condition that she return to court Wednesday to sign the $100,000 bond for her continued release.

Drug treatment and testing are additional conditions of her release, according to the Justice Department.

If convicted of the charge, Woodrum would face a minimum of five years and a maximum of 40 years in jail and a $2 million fine, the department said.

Kevin O'Regan, assistant U.S. Attorney in the New England Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, is prosecuting the case.

According to college officials, a drug arrest at the college is "an extremely rare incident."

According to college records, one arrest for possession of marijuana was recorded in the 1970s. The college's alcohol and drug awareness program, which began in 1976, focuses on "prevention, intervention and the continuous exploration of drug-related issues."

GEO breaks talks

Strike may be scheduled for March 1

By PRESTON P. FORMAN

One day before a possible strike vote, the Graduate Employee Organization broke off talks with the University administration yesterday afternoon after failing to receive recognition as an affiliate of the United Auto Workers.

In a statement released last night, the organization plans to recommend at its membership meeting at 5 p.m. that graduate student employees hold a one-day work stoppage Mar. 1.

The GEO also plans to ask members to issue a formal request to the UAW for authorization of a strike. All action of the GEO must be approved by the membership as a whole.

Provost Richard O'Brien said he had hoped to avert a strike of graduate student employees and that no plans had yet been made to deal with one.

"For the sake of education we hope they don't strike," he said. "I hope that graduate employees feel ambivalently about walking off the scene of teaching."

Officials of the GEO demanded that the organization be referred to as "GEO/District 65/United Auto Workers" in the election called for in the contract. The GEO has been affiliated with District 65/UAW since last November. When the University objected to this statement, the GEO left the table.

Susan Pearson, director of Academic Administration and the University's representative at negotiations, said the University was advised by legal counsel that GEO could not be referred to as GEO/District 65/UAW in the contract.

In addition, legal counsel told the University it could not enter into any contract with a third party organizations such as the UAW. As the contract reads, the administration would be "willing to enter into a relationship with an organization indigenous to the Amherst campus."

"It all goes back to the 1979 Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission ruling that graduate students could not have collective bargaining," Pearson said. "[UMass] does not have the legal authority to recognize the GEO, only the Board of Regents."

"I got hooked on Egypt," said Du Bois, of his first visit in 1960 to the country. He came back to the United States for five years in 1972, then returned to Egypt

Two Americans kidnapped in Columbia

CARTAGENA, Columbia (AP) — Leftist guerrillas kidnapped two Americans to protest President Bush's visit here next week and said they would put their captives on trial, police said today.

The Americans, snatched in the drug capital of Medellin, were identified as David Kent and James Archer Donelly, a police spokesman told the Associated Press.

Donnelly was released unhurt at 10:30 a.m. about three hours after he was kidnapped, said an official at the school where Kent is a teacher. He was released along with his Colombian girlfriend, the official said on condition of anonymity.

The school official said Donnelly was told by his captors that they were leftist guerrillas and had taken the action to protest Bush's visit Thursday for a four-nation drug summit.

In Washington, the State Department confirmed the kidnappings but said Donnelly was kidnapped Monday night.

The Columbian radio network Caracol said its Medellin station received a telephone call from an anonymous man claiming to be a spokesman for leftist guerrillas who claimed responsibility for the abductions.

The man said the two men would be put on trial and would be released in five days, Caracol said. The caller did not explain why there would be a trial and why the captives would be released.

Columbian radio network RCN said Kent was from Indianapolis. The police said he had lived in Medellin for several years and was a teacher at the Colombo bilingual, private school.

Donnelly runs a company called Exco that manufactures hydraulic equipment, the police spkesman said on condition of anonymity. He said he had no further details on the men.

The spokesmen said the kidnappers were from the National Liberation Army, a leftist guerrilla group, known by its initials in Spanih as the ELN.

There was no way to confirm if the kinappers really are leftist guerrillas. Drug traffickers have been found in the past posing as leftist insurgents.

U.S. Ambassador to Colombia Thomas McNamara, speaking at a news conference Tuesday in Cartegena, would not comment on possible negotiations with the traffickers. He said such talks, proposed by the traffickers, are an internal matter for the Columbian government.

Bush not influenced by terrorism

WASHINGTON (AP) — The White House today denounced the kidnapping of two Americans in Colombia to protest President Bush's planned visit, saying it "cannot allow threats of terrorism to influence its policies or its activities."

Presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Bush "shares the concern of all Americans about the kidnapping of these U.S. citizens" and would cooperate with Colombian officials to help "in any way deemed appropriate to help resolve this situation."

Fitzwater also sought to minimize reports that Bush might use the occasion of the drug summit to propose a "radar net" off Colombia using United States warships to help track cocaine-carrying aircraft.

"I don't expect him to bring it up at the drug conference unless Colombia or other Latin American countries bring the subject up first," Fitzwater said.

The spokesman's comments came on the eve of Bush's day-long attendance at a four-nation drug summit in Cartegena, a resort city on the northern coast of Colombia.

Madson: problems will end on New Africa House floor

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson said yesterday that problems students have encountered in accessing the fourth floor of the New Africa House should and will be resolved, although he would not give a specific date.

Madson was so frustrated with the situation that he said he would consider taking matters into his own hands.

"If any student is having trouble getting in there, go to Ann Quinley's [Academic Affairs] office and ask for a key," he said. Or if she's not there, I'll go over and open the door."

Last week, members of several student organizations charged the administration with not fulfilling agreements made in February, 1988, regarding the fourth floor New Africa House.

Since 1988, eight offices on the south side of the floor have been allocated by Chancellor Duffey for student organization use. The allocation was made after several dozen students held a four-day sit-in at the house.

Students said last week that they have found the fourth floor locked and dark during the day, and at that time complained of inconvenient building hours that conflict with classes.

Ernie Allen, a professor in the W.E.B. Du Bois African-American Studies Department, said last week a security risk exists when the door to the fourth floor is left unlocked because of the newly-installed Bannecker computer facility.

"Students do not and will not get keys to the door of a $70,000 computer lab," he said.

Madson said ways exist to protect the computer investment on the fourth floor, as well as provide student access to the floor.

"Students should and will have access to these offices, even if that requires putting in new doors to protect the computer center," he said. "We'll do whatever it takes."

Ricardo Townes, dean of academic affairs, said his department was supposed to receive keys to access the fourth floor door but has not.

"Ernie Allen has the keys to the fourth floor," he said, "and he has locked everybody out."

Rudy Krigger, member of the Pan-African Student Association, which has its office on the fourth floor, said students have been very confused and angry about the inaccessibility to the floor.

"[Students] have been on some sort of merry-go-round as to whom we can get our keys," he said. "First we're told to go to Student Affairs, then to Academic Affairs, then to Afro-Am."

Madson said keys to access the door to the fourth floor have been ordered for the Academic Affairs office.

Allen, a member of the New Africa House Space Committee, in charge of determining the usage and control of the fourth floor, said although a problem existed with getting students to attend the meetings, students understood and agreed to the policies recommended by the committee.

Krigger said he was supposed to be on a steering committee to determine usage of the fourth floor but was never contacted about any meetings.

Madson said tension exists between the department and its students over control of the fourth floor, but the issue is complex because the New Africa House accommodates classroom as well as office space.

"There is no one person in charge of the New Africa House," he said. "But I think there should be a group of students, as well as faculty and staff, to talk about the building's coordination."

When asked whether he believed that students should have had input in deciding who actually controls the building, Allen remarked, "Students don't have to be a part of every decision-making policy on campus."

Armbands to fight federal cuts to battered women's programs

By JULIE MCKENNA
Collegian Correspondent

The Progressive Organization for Women's Rights at the University of Massachusetts launched a red armband drive yesterday to protest $1.1 million in federal spending cuts facing battered women's programs.

"We hope to create an awareness that Valentine's Day is not necessarily a holiday for battered women and children," said Gina Gombar, organization co-president.

The holiday was chosen to mark the fact that one women is murdered by a family member every 10 days in Massachusetts, said Susan Stinson, executive director of Necessities/Necessidades, a Northampton battered women's shelter.

Battered womens' services in Massachusetts can expect a 25 percent cut if President Bush's budget is passed, and Necessities/Necessidades can expect to lose $39,500 of its annual $150,000, Gombar said.

Robert Fadel, a UMass graduate student who wore an armband said, "I think this is effective because people have tried to hide away from the ugly aspects of our society, but the armbands bring it to our attention."

Stinson said "community support means so much because battered women get isolated and caught in the cycle of abuse."

GSS says election is needed to end dilemma of GEO status

By MARGARET MCATEER
Collegian Correspondent

The Graduate Student Senate Tuesday night called for the University administration to agree to an election to resolve the status of the Graduate Employees Organization.

The GEO is seeking recognition as a union from the administration, but the administration has refused.

Pierre Laliberte, senate vice president, said graduate students should have the right to decide whether they should have collective bargaining powers.

"I think an election is very positive," said Cataline Castillon Dodson, the senate president. "It is a way for everybody to go there and express themselves."

In other business, the GSS voted to increase the Graduate Student Fee by $5, to urge that fee waivers be granted to all graduate students and to support the Legal Services Center's efforts to regain partial litigation rights.

The $5 increase ($2.50 per semester) for fiscal year 1991 is the result of an increase in the Transit Fee from $10 to $15. According to Marabeth Clapp, director of administration services, the increase is necessary to offset expected reductions in federal and state aid.

The GSS said they are opposed to the $400 curriculum-fee increase for graduate students and asked that as a temporary measure the administration extend fee waivers to all graduate students.

The Senate also allocated $1,000 for March Indian Awareness Month, $750 to the Magic Triangle Jazz Series, $250 to the Sustainable Agriculture Seminar Series and $75 to UMass Solidarity.

Delta Chi wins award for upping GPA

By LYNN MORELLI
Collegian Correspondent

Delta Chi fraternity was presented last week with the first annual University of Massachusetts Greek Area Chancellor's Award for Academic Achievement. Edward Korza, newly-appointed director of Greek Affairs, made the presentation.

The award was given to the Delta house for having the highest rise in collective grade point average, from 2.35 to 2.59, among the University's fraternities. The average was a calculation of 23 active Delta Chi brothers, all of whom were present at the ceremony.

Geoffrey Hosford, acting president of Delta Chi, accepted the plaque on behalf of his brothers. When asked about the effects that the award has had on the morale of the fraternity, Hosford said, "It's definitely on the upswing," adding, "This early in the semester, it's good."

Hosford said that receiving the award at this time has given Delta Chi an early enthusiasm for fund raising and rush, the semester drive for new brothers.

Korza said the award was created to improve the image and the reputation of the Greek Area. He said he believes that the positive publicity it promises to bring, will cast a light on other academic and philanthropic achievements of the Greek Area.

Chancellor Duffey, who was scheduled but unable to attend the ceremony, sent a letter of congratulations and commendation to the brothers of Delta Chi.

In the letter, Duffey praised the fraternity for setting an example for others to follow. "As a Delta Chi, your success serves as clear evidence of what can be achieved when everyone makes a collective effort."

Last semester the brothers of Delta Chi raised money for multiple sclerosis by sponsoring a leave-raking drive around the Pioneer Valley, Hosford said. They also raised money by going door-to-door for the Amherst Shelter, after learning that the shelter was only equipped with four beds for women.

UMass to join worldwide hunger fast for Chinese

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted unanimously last night to join other universities in a worldwide hunger fast slated for May. The fast is scheduled in an effort to support non-violent dialogue between the Chinese people and their government.

Three universities from the USSR and several from the United States will participate in the fast, which will commence at sunset May 12 and end at sunset May 13.

UMass student Alexander Nguyen has been in contact with Harvard University, which will coordinate schools on the East Coast of the United States.

"I don't think the students realize the magnitude of what they've just decided," Nguyen said last night. "It's the first time there has been such worldwide student solidarity."

He said plans have been made to collect monies not spent on the meal plan and allocate the amount to the Graduate Chinese Student Organization on campus, Nguyen said.

- In other senate news:

Commuter Area Government senator Angus McQuilken and Orchard Hill Area Government senator Victoria Clement announced their candidacies for student trustee.

McQuilken has been a member of MassPIRG for two years and a representative from Southwest Area Government for one year.

Clement, OHAG vice president, has been a senator for three semesters and is co-chairperson of the Senate Rents & Fees Committee.

The allies plan for a unified Germany

OTTAWA (AP) — The four World War II Allies, vanquishers of Nazi Germany and occupiers of Berlin, have begun a process aimed at ensuring a unified Germany will not pose a threat to world security.

Foreign ministers from France, Britain, the Soviet Union and United States announced Tuesday that they would meet with their counterparts from East and West Germany to discuss the alignment and military strength of a unified Germany.

No date for such a meeting was given, but before it takes place the two Germanys will be left alone to tackle the considerable domestic hurdles that must be overcome before unity is possible.

With Tuesday's announcement, the powers that divided Germany in 1945 clearly acknowledged that reunification is inevitable now that Communist rule has collapsed in East Germany.

The brief, one-paragraph statement did not address U.S. concerns that a unified Germany belong to the NATO alliance. The Soviet Union seeks a neutral state. The announcement said preliminary talks by lower-level officials on a unified Germany's place in the new European order would begin "shortly."

It was released about an hour before the Soviet Union and United States announced agreement on troops cuts in Europe in which the Soviets essentially accept a proposal by President Bush in agreeing to a ceiling of 195,000 troops for each side in Central Europe.

The agreement allows the United States to keep an additional 30,000 troops elsewhere in Europe, which Mikhail S. Gorbachev had rejected just last week in seeking parity.

The announcements came during a conference of 23 NATO and Warsaw Pact countries on opening up the world's skies to surveillance by unarmed military planes.

Officials have shied away from saying when a unified Germany could become a reality, but the two German states are moving swiftly toward that end. On Tuesday, they set up a joint commission to set up a single currency.

West Germany's foreign minister, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, said in Ottawa on Tuesday that he hoped a 35-nation summit would address the issue of reunification in November.

The statement on a single German state said six-country talks would focus on "external aspects of the establishment of German unity, including the issues of security of the neighboring states."

The foreign ministers made no comment after release of statement, apparently reflecting their desire not to create undue expectations or prejudice the work facing the two Germanys.

The four-power plan, adapted from a U.S. initiative, calls for the powers to address external security concerns only after East Germans elect new leaders in free elections set for Mar. 18, U.S. officials said.

The plan was first set forward by Secretary of State James A. Baker III and dubbed "Two Plus Four" for the two Germanys and the Allies.

The statement came after the foreign ministers met for several hours on the issue, overshadowing the "Open Skies" conference.

Concerns about Germany's alignment stems from the strategic importance of the region.

Pearson said she thought they were very close to an agreement on all other issues such as financial aid fee waivers and assurances that the total number of graduate student employees this spring would be no lower than last fall.

"But the one thing we could not do was go contractly into a contract with the United Auto Workers," she said.

O'Brien said he was disappointed that GEO had broken off talks since he believed the two sides were making good progress.

"We were anxious to solve the problems of treatment of TAs and RAs and were surprised that the break-off was based solely on the question of union involvement," he said.

Mark Kenen, a GEO coordinating committee member, said while union recognition was important, other concerns of the organization had not been met. He said the administration refused to give the GEO any "binding enforcement" of any agreement reached with the University.

The contract also did not contain fee waivers for research assistants, although negotiations were continuing on this issue.

The Radical Student Union has called a Union of Undergraduates meeting in the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8 p.m. to discuss possible ways to support the GEO.

Author: 'disintegration' in Sri Lanka

Says nation's civil wars are causing disaster

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Sri Lanka is a society "breaking under pressure" and as a result 40 to 50 burnt bodies are found each day, according to George Lakey, author of Powerful Peacemaking and an activist who recently returned from the country.

In a presentation sponsored by the Sri Lanka Support Group and the Peace Brigades International last night in Memorial Hall, Lakey said the inner turmoil in Sri Lanka is leading the nation to "a slow disintigration."

Lakey said he went to Sri Lanka, a small country in the Indian Ocean, in October to protect human rights lawyers, six of whom had been murdered by the time he had arrived. From June, 1989, until October, 1989, escalations between the Sri Lankan government and various militant groups led to the deaths of as many as 4,000 civilians, Lakey said.

He said one main reason for the uprisings against the oppressive government is the incredible poverty in Sri Lanka. Lakey said 80 percent of Sri Lankans live in poverty, while 60 percent are malnourished.

Lakey said the poverty is because of Sri Lanka's strong ties to the global market, where severe fluxuations can result in dramatic shifts in demand for Sri Lankan exports.

"Sri Lanka became dependant on the global market when they were colonized by England, now their economy isn't strong enough to stand alone," he said.

Lakey said although most of the country lives in poverty, Sri Lanka has a literacy rate of about 90 percent and colleges are free. He said this has added a class of well-educated young people who can not find jobs or places in government and added to the turmoil.

He said there are currently two civil wars occurring inside Sri Lanka, with a guerilla group attemping to overthrow the government. The result has been several government killings in an effort to quiet opposition, he said.

"A person can be shot down for hanging a political poster," he said. "The government keeps body banks of young civilian men to take out and kill for each crime against the government."

Lakey said in terms of sexism, women in Sri Lanka are treated almost the same as women in the United States, and are raised similarly. Lakey said he hopes the women in Sri Lanka decide their socialization process was right and take charge of the situation.

"Women aren't brought up with the idea they have to prove their manhood, and as a result women aren't hooked in the prevailing madness that the only way an issue can be resolved is through violence," he said.

Filmmaker Michael Moore had as much trouble meeting Oscar as he did catching General Motors president Roger Smith in his documentary "Roger and Me." The film failed to win a nomination in the documentary feature category.

Recent weeks have brought criticism of Moore's film for its faulty juxtaposition of time elements and its entertainment values at the expense of accuracy. The awards ceremony will be held March 26 and broadcast nationally on ABC-TV.

The trouble with Hitchcock

By KARI J. BODNARCHUK
Collegian Correspondent

John Michael Hayes, former screenwriter for Alfred Hitchcock, has been hurdled many obstacles in his life, but always knew one thing – he wanted to write. Whether he could succeed at it he didn't know and now that he has, he doesn't feel that his talents have been fully realized.

Hayes is a fascinating man who's led an extraordinary life.

By the time he was 8 years old, he was reading Hemingway, encyclopedias, poetry and basically anything he could get his hands on, all of which, he says, helped him to learn about characters and plotting.

After landing a job with the Associated Press at age 16, Hayes eventually attended UMass in 1937 (when tuition was $120). Following his 1941 graduation, the young, aspiring writer wrote scripts for Lucille Ball and Sam Spade, among others.

When he joined the army, he sought talent to perform in the army camp theaters. This experience led to his job as a projectionist. During his first month a the camp (before he had worked with Hitchcock), Hayes had to show Hitchcock's Shadow of a Doubt (1943), "three times a day for 30 days because we didn't get a new film until the end of the month. I watched the thing 90 times! Years later, Hitchcock and I were at the Beverly Hills Hotel and after the alcohol hit me, I began telling him the problems with his movie."

It was in the 50s that Hayes hooked up with Hitchcock and was hired to write the screenplay for Rear Window (1954).

"I had a wonderful relationship with Hitch," says Hayes.

"He was a fascinating man and fun to work with. I got my PhD. from Hitchcock University."

Following Rear Window, Hayes went on to write several more screenplays for Hitchcock, such as To Catch a Thief (1955), a picture "we did for fun," The Trouble with Harry (1956) and The Man Who Knew Too Much (1956).

The films were a success and the media began to praise "Hitchcock and Hayes." This fact annoyed Hitchcock and the two had a falling out. They "stopped working together and went on to do our own stuff." Hayes recalls Hitchcock's films after his departure were failures, economically and financially.

"Hitch refused to speak to me at that time. He wouldn't just say 'I'm jealous of the position the press has moved you into.' He found excuses not to call or work with me. What talent I had and what talent he had seemed to meld together. We worked well together, but he was stubborn and refused to call. He didn't want to admit that he needed me."

Hayes continued to work on other films which came to be successful, including Peyton Place (1957), Harlow (1965), and Nevada Smith (1966). He also wrote the script for the 1988 CBS drama Poncho Barnes. Hayes is now working on a four-hour television drama on the life of Indira Gandhi. He is currently living in Hanover, N.H. and teaching advanced screenwriting classes at Dartmouth College.

A jazzy triangle of magical wonder

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

I can write this column and you can read it until we both go blind, and I won't have succeeded in turning you on to jazz until you actually go out and hear some of it live.

Valley Jazz

Now there is a solution. It's The Magic Triangle, a series of three jazz concerts to take place this semester on Thursday nights at Hampden Theatre in Southwest, produced by WMUA, Residential Arts Council and Union Progam Council. The name of the series derived from the fact that all three concerts will feature trios. This is it, folks: all three gigs will feature great artists, and tickets are an astoundingly low $5 for Five College students ($7 for non-students).

The first Magic Triangle concert happens a week from tonight at 8 p.m.; it will be a trio led by trombonist Steve Turre. Turre is at the forefront of the recent "brass revival," taking place after more than three decades of saxophonic hegemony. He represents the entire history of the jazz trombone in his music, from Kid Ory and the "tailgaiting" tradition of turn-of-the-century New Orleans, through the lightning bebop of J.J. Johnson, to the avant-garde sounds of Roswell Rudd and George Lewis, and on into the 80s.

Turre represents the best impulses of the 80s/90s jazz musician: He is an innovator who looks back. "Going as far back into the music as you can determines how far forward you can go," he says. Not bad for a guy whose bread-and-butter gig is with the Saturday Night Live band.

His trio will be rounded out, not by the standard bass-and-drums rhythm section, but by the intriguing combination of piano (Mulgrew Miller) and tuba (Bob Stewart). Miller is simply the hottest young pianist on the scene today, constantly in demand to perform with many of jazz's major practitioners. Like many young pianists, he is heavily influenced by McCoy Tyner; in fact, he first attracted my attention on Branford Marsalis' Scenes in the City album with a solo that fooled me into thinking that it was the real McCoy. Since then, he has developed his own identity as a powerful soloist, especially as part of Tony Williams' quintet.

Tubist Bob Stewart is another important participant in the "brass revival" – remember that the tuba was the original bass instrument of jazz in New Orleans, right alongside those tailgating trombones. But, like Turre, Stewart goes well beyond mere nostalgia-mongering: He has appeared with very contemporary artists such as Arthur Blythe and David Murray, and such masters of the recent era as Tyner and Charles Mingus.

The musicians in this trio have played in each other's bands before; both Stewart and Turre are also members of Lester Bowie's Brass Fantasy. All three appeared on Turre's Viewpoint album. But this trio, as such, will make its debut next Thursday at Hampden Theatre, and Turre is hopeful that it will become a working group. They should provide an auspicious start to the Magic Triangle concert series.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Support for GEO

The Graduate Employee Organization deserves recognition by the University of Massachusetts administration. It is myopic for Chancellor Duffey and Provost O'Brien to cite a ten-year-old, inappropriate precedent to deny GEO's bid for unionization.

Clearly, the University is today involved in a budget crisis and graduate student employees' vulnerability in this crisis cannot remain unrecognized. The demands set last month by GEO, now affiliated with District 65/United Auto Workers are quite reasonable and should, most certainly, be met.

The rescission of a $400 curriculum fee is hardly unreasonable because the $400 fee is used to pay the salaries of the 2,500 graduate student employees. The request that the number of teaching assistants, associates and research assistants not drop significantly this semester is imperative. If their numbers drop, so do the number of classes available.

Most importantly, GEO is asking for recognition by the University. This recognition would increase their chances of receiving collective bargaining power from the Board of Regents.

In response to the other demands, the University said financial aid will be awarded to eligible students to help with the $400 fee. Awarding students aid to help them pay their own wages avoids the real issue of GEO recognition. It smacks of vicious, bureaucratic circling.

Duffey and O'Brien are hiding behind technicalities.

Administrators also said there are no plans to decrease the number of graduate student employees. But the administration's word simply does not carry the assurance that collective bargaining and unionization can provide.

GEO members are acting because they are witnesses, along with the rest of the UMass community, to how swiftly and completely the ax has fallen on the state's critical programs.

As educators, GEO cannot allow their numbers to be diminished.

As students, we must support their cause.

Survey a junk mail joke

I live for junk mail.

I say this because, besides letters from my mother, I rarely get anything personally addressed to me that hasn't been spit out by some mass-production computer. Of course, the mail that I do get never reaches my apartment, because our mailbox gets ripped out of the wall on a weekly basis.

Jim Clark

So imagine my surprise when I got home the other night and found the following important document on my table: "Thank you very much for joining in our Arbitron Ratings television survey."

At first, I was somewhat relieved. At least I hadn't been picked to be a Nielsen family. I'm not sure I want to change my last name.

So I read on. "Our interviewer may have explained that your name was chosen when we drew a representative sample of television set owners in your community."

This is where I was thrown. First, it was my roommate's TV, so why didn't he get this dumb survey? Second, who was this "interviewer" that supposedly explained this to me? I guess maybe she could have talked to one of the other three James Clarks in the UMass phone book. Maybe they all set me up to pay me back for the late night calls they've probably gotten from angry people who were looking to kill me. ("Are you sure you're not the Jim Clark from the Collegian?")

Anyway, they gave me this booklet, complete with instructions on how to fill it out. I found this particularly useful, seeing as how the thing resembles your basic tax form, another piece of mail I could do without.

Fortunately, the instructions look like a children's book, filled with pictures, arrows and all sorts of fun stuff. If they had included crayons, you could have colored the thing in. Except, of course, that would take time away from watching TV.

First, they ask you to list all of the stations you receive. Now, I'm not sure if they realize this, but some people in this world have cable. We get 35 channels, and listing them all would probably fill the whole book itself. Imagine if we had a satellite dish. We'd need a book the size of a Sears catalog.

Next, they ask to list names and ages, which makes perfect sense. Nothing like getting a wide range of tastes by surveying four college males who were born less than three months apart.

Finally, it says, "write down what you watch," by listing the channel, the call letters (quick, what are the call letters for Channel 3 in Hartford?), and who was watching. Unless of course, the set was on and no one was watching. This could only happen in my apartment, where people tend to leave all of the appliances on when they're not using them.

So that's it. Simple, huh? Unfortunately, they seem to have forgotten that wonderful device that gets a lot of use in our place — the remote control. It's not uncommon for us to flip through the dial three times, stopping for a few moments at a time on various channels.

True, there are glitches in the system. Such as the line that says, "please do not record video game or computer use of your television set in the diary." Which eliminates about three hours of Nintendo use every day.

Wait, what's this in the envelope? Fifty cents? Yep, two whole quarters wrapped in cellophane as your reward for filling out this little book. Well, guess I can't pass it up now.

So I'll fill out the diary and mail it back (it comes pre-stamped). Maybe flip through the Cable guide, find shows that I like and fill them in en masse. After all, you can never get enough of David Letterman or the Three Stooges.

Maybe when they get this booklet back and see what a farce we made of it, they'll take the hint. I know they mean well, but maybe then they'll realize just how easily evil-spirited people like myself can ruin their fun. And then, maybe they'll leave me alone.

If only taxes were so easy.

The pain of stereotyping

Sadly one of the commonplaces of social discourse in contemporary society is negativity directed toward the poor.

One is informed with utter certitude that they are lazy and ignorant. Some are.

Just as some upper-class and some middle-class folks are lazy and ignorant.

But such defects are seldom identified with "the Haves."

Jay Allain

It seems it is always "open season" on the poor.

Who are the poor then? Can one generalize about their condition? We should recall the issue of income distribution, which in itself is grossly unfair.

Recent statistics show that the richest one percent of the population controls approximately one-third of all the wealth in the United States

This means that for the rest of us, the playing field is not level. For the poor it is simply Himalayan.

As the dream of a nation of true equality recedes, we are moving into a two-tiered world — separate and unequal. Yet, all of this is reversible.

When we hear remarks about the non-person status of the poor, which suggest that they are fundamentally "not like us," we should try to envision the niche the poor dwell in.

To be poor is to be the loser in a society that worships money and security.

It is to face daily the insecurity of mere survival.

For example, illness, merely a nuisance for "the Haves," becomes a traumatic event.

Without health care (and a large portion of the poor are not cared for), treatable ailments may be neglected. If medical care is sought, only the least expensive treatment may be available and even that may disrupt the poor person's budget for months.

Lurking beneath our attitudes toward the poor is a certain Calvinism: To be destitute is to be in disfavor in God's eyes. What poppycock!

While hard-working folks sometimes sneer at their fellow citizens receiving welfare, they forget that the payments are low, the interviews are intrusive and the situations become worse. While the poor, according to the true Judeo-Christian ethic, should be beneficiaries of our empathy and generosity, we shun them and think ourselves exonerated.

They have become an accepted scapegoat.

Where is the anger toward our reluctance to tax the rich, to enforce rent control and to provide wages that one can live (rather than survive) on?

According to the new "liberation theology" that has been drifting northward from Central America, God sides with the downtrodden. He is on the side of the poor.

Speaking of God's relationship to the destitute, the writer-monk Thomas Merton twenty years ago observed, "He is mysteriously present in them for whom there seems to be nothing but the world at its worst. For them, there is no escape even in imagination."

Most of us grapple with the occasional bout of illness, the lack of money or being looked upon with scorn. We deal with the crisis and then resume our normal lifestyle.

For many of the poor, these are a constant threat. At the very least we should not add to their burden by stereotyping them.

This requires courage — something that will not be advertised on TV.

Sexist flesh, not sensual fantasy

Elle Macpherson. Rachel Hunter. Kathy Ireland. These names are commonplace in America today. Why? Not because of their contributions to science, humanities or medical research. It's because of the Sports Illustrated's Swimsuit Issue.

These women are only known for the way they appear in a bathing suit. They are known for their beautiful faces and perfect measurements.

The Swimsuit Issue has serious flaws in this world where women demand an equal place with men — and where they deserve that equality. The issue is not for the fashion industry to display the hot looks of the summer.

Oh, on the contrary. It is for the gratification of the men who believe that one of the greatest sports is not on the field or the court but rather the "hunt of the woman."

At lunch the other day, I heard the complaint that this year's edition was not as spectacular as most others. The reason (and I cringe) was the women were not beautiful enough.

Not beautiful enough? Listen, pal, if Kathy Ireland isn't gorgeous, then you must have cataracts or something. This response to the magazine incensed me. The male (give me hot flesh) audience was not appeased with the amount of skin, the curves of the bodies and the faces which accompanied them.

Gayle Long

I know that it is all an advertisement for sex. It is that perfect woman, the one that can't speak or respond to you, that leads to the incredible sexual experience of a lifetime, isn't it? This same experience has nothing to do in the slightest with love, caring or intimate understandings. NAH!!!

The Swimsuit Issue is truly a contradiction in terms not only of the emotions but also of equality. The listing of the designers and the prices of the suits would lead one to believe that the target audience is women. But since this magazine is predominately read by men, are men rushing out to buy these suits for themselves? Or are they looking to buy swimming apparel for their significant other?

On the other hand, if the magazine IS targeted for women, then where, if I may be so bold as to ask, are Mel Gibson, Tom Cruise and Doug Flutie?

I can see it now — the three of them, joined by equally bodacious celebrities, flaunting their well-toned bodies in skimpy pieces of cloth (let's be honest. We know that they aren't bathing suits). All enjoying the scenery of some tropical locale, flirting with the natives.

The Swimsuit Issue has been around for 26 years, and every year it has grown progressively bolder and revealing (pun intended). The Flesh Issue appears to be a much more fitting title, because the models show more flesh than suit.

One of the suits this year (yes, I saw it, but I surely didn't BUY it) modeled by Ms. Macpherson was missing close to the entire right side. I must be asking for too much when I expect an entire bathing suit for $52.

Another thing that ticks me off is the television commercials to get the viewer to buy a subscription to Sports Illustrated. The announcer acts like it is such a great bonus to have the Swimsuit Issue tossed in for no extra charge. A very sideshow approach, if you ask me. The magazine tries to get the viewer to give the subscription as a gift, and in doing so, can assume that women want men to look at this stuff — they want their male acquaintances to view women in this "look and want to touch" manner. This entire concept is totally disgusting.

We are led to believe that the focus of Sports Illustrated is upon the world of professional and collegiate sports. But every year when this issue comes out, I don't and can't see it that way.

I see it as a way to attract readers with flashy suits and naked derrieres.

Well, since the male moral majority which critiqued the photo montage were unsatisified, maybe they will stop drooling and panting over it each year.

But you and I know better.

Long-distance love affair, a sorrow of the heart

My heart is breaking. Slowly but surely, my heart is breaking. My friends can't tell. I can usually hide things with laughter. My co-workers can't tell. I still manage to get my work done. My teachers can't tell. They don't know me. On the outside I'm okay. But inside, my heart is slowly shattering.

My girlfriend lives a million miles away. Anybody that understands me or understands some of my writing knows that already. They know what it's done to me. They've seen me cry or have read my soul bleeding. I write from my heart and my mind. She is in those places. It keeps her closer to me.

She and I have been emotionally together since the summer and physically apart since the summer's end. We have stolen some moments here and there but mostly we've held on with love and hope. Our hearts have done the holding. Mine is too strong to let go. Instead it is starting to break.

Last semester was my worst semester since I started college. I wasn't here. I went through the motions trying to get it together. Someone up there had granted me the most wonderful gift, the gift of love, and then told me I could not unwrap it. Why? All I've wanted to do for the past eight months is open the gift and hold it next to me.

Why is my heart breaking? It's breaking for a lot of reasons. I was horribly selfish. I wanted my girlfriend here. I wanted all that goes with falling in love, the handholding, the snuggling, the mushy stuff, all of it. Terribly greedy, wasn't I?

Josh Galitsky

I wanted to share my hopes. I wanted to do homework with her or walk her to class. I wanted to eat dinner with her or picnic by the pond or browse through campus center with her. I wanted to tickle her or be silly or just watch t.v.

I wanted to have someone to come home to and give myself to or just fall asleep next to. I wanted to be around each other so much that we'd get annoyed and crave a night apart with other friends. I wanted it all. I wanted it longer than just a weekend.

I thought the worst part of all was missing her. That was at first. I would actually physically ache, feeling that indescribable longing that has to be felt to be understood. The night felt so dark. I could actually feel how far away she was from me.

But that is only a part of it. Not being able to be there for her is worse. It kills me. Not being able to share in her life, make her smile and see who she is day to day is torment. I feel like I am fading away. And everything I try desperately to do is not enough to keep it from happening.

Imagine being in a place in life where everything you did and everything you said was not enough. Imagine believing in what you were doing and believing it was the right thing and always being wrong. Imagine if all your efforts were mistakes and all your dreams were long shots.

Imagine wanting something more than you've ever wanted anything and not having control over getting it. Imagine caring with your whole heart and appearing to be thoughtless or indifferent. Imagine having all your wishes sealed up in a little box that outside forces were deciding whether to cherish or discard. Imagine love on hold. Imagine two hearts breaking.

I love my girlfriend very much. And she loves me very much. Some may laugh at that and call it stupid or syrupy, but I don't give a damn! Nobody has ever understood us from the beginning. It's really sad how human beings can sing about love, write about love, talk about love, dream about love, and live for love. But when it isn't happening to them, they know nothing about love.

I don't know what the future holds, none of us can. I know where my hopes are and I know where my heart is. And to my girlfriend who will read this soon, I love you very much. I hope to God that love will be enough.

Letters to the Editor

Hoop fans get too out of hand

To everybody who cheered for the UMass Minutemen Basketball team last Sunday at the Curry Hicks Cage: You guys were great!

I've never seen a crowd so into every play of the game as you were!

To the few individuals who lost control of themselves and very nearly destroyed everything that the University's Basketball program has worked to build: Maybe you ought to sit out for a few games.

Specifically, the individuals that threw things at the visiting Temple University team.

Hey, whatever happens, it is still only a game!

Think about it before you get self-righteous and call me up screaming "they deserved it" or some other ridiculous justification.

We were lucky on Sunday. That situation could have gotten way out of control.

Consider the fact that it was the most incredible game of basketball that most of us have ever seen here. Then add the fact that the Cage was brimming over with thousands of fans worked up to fever pitch.

Then something happens they don't like.

Things get out of line.

Tempers flare.

Then people start throwing things at the team that we are supposed to be hosting?!

These guys came to play ball, not to make people mad at them. You can be sure they didn't come to be physically abused.

But they were, by a few people who couldn't control themselves. It could have turned into a pretty ugly mess.

These things are for fun. A basketball game isn't worth getting hurt over. Oh, and by the way, congratulations to the basketball team for cooling the crowd down.

One hell of game, guys!

False security about AIDS

In your article "Study reveals decreased AIDS cases on campuses," (Feb. 12) remarks that I made to the author, Chris Muther, were taken completely out of context.

In summary, let me reiterate what I tried to say to him:

1. The number of AIDS cases s increasing (up to over 115,000 by November, 1989, in the United States), including increased cases among college students.

2. The rate of two cases per thousand of HIV-positive individuals shows precisely that college students are at risk for infection with the AIDS virus and eventual AIDS. Safer sex techniques are the only thing that can prevent this number from increasing.

3. The lower rate of AIDS cases in college students is probably due to the amount of time it takes between infection with the HIV virus and the development of symptoms called AIDS, which may be as much as six to nine years. In other words, college students can be infected with the HIV virus and leave college before they become an "AIDS case," thus excluding them from this statistic.

4. The low number of reported AIDS cases in Hampshire County (the lowest rate in the state) does not indicate higher or lower risk at the University, since HIV infection occurs years before AIDS is diagnosed.

Unfortunately, I am afraid the article gives a false sense of security to students at the University, who themselves need to make every effort to protect themselves from HIV infection. Even one case is too many, especially when the disease is preventable.

Leon deemed SGA antagonist

I would like to respond to Peter Leon's editorial ("Notes From the Campus Center Basement," Feb. 12).

The leadership in the Undergraduate Senate has been extremely careful in dealing with the issue of possible misuse of SGA equipment for political purposes.

We have tried to act in a professional manner that was fair to all parties involved, while still working to keep the Undergraduate Senate, the Legislative Branch, outside of this recent problem.

This issue has involved student government officials in the Judicial Branch, the Executive Branch and members of the Commuter Area Government. It was brought before the Senate by Trustee Eric Nakajima and others involved only as an announcement. Senate members sat, listened and asked a few questions.

When the announcements ended we began dealing with motions on our agenda, none pertaining to this issue. The Undergraduate Senate had no involvement in it.

Peter Leon tells us to "keep the faith." Unfortunately, this is difficult to do when working to improve the Senate and a misinformed editorialist, who has repeatedly expressed his animosity towards the Senate, brings us into fiascos such as this one.

Organization looks for safety

In honor of Passenger Safety Week, Feb. 11 to Feb. 17, I invite the UMass community to think on these statistics:

Seat belts cut your chances of being killed or seriously maimed in the event of a crash by more than 60 percent.

Over 1800 people have been injured in motor vehicle crashes just in Northampton within the past four years. This averages out to one motor vehicle injury crash per day.

Three out of four crashes happen within 25 miles of home.

Speakers put everyone's lives at risk: Fifty-one percent of speed-related deaths are either passengers, pedestrians or bicylists — not the speeding drivers themselves.

Many drivers may think that speeding will get them to their destinations much more quickly, but the time saved is usually negligible.

For example, for a typical five-mile trip to the store, driving 40 mph will save you only 2½ minutes compared to driving only 30 mph. And if you're in heavy traffic, or if you get stopped at a light or two, you won't even save the 2½ minutes. Is it worth the risk to save only 2½ minutes?

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Quick decisions are necessary when you deal with influential people. A close friend's advice is worth following. Your finances may need attention. A surprise could have a startling effect on your future.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your energy may rise and fall in concert with your enthusiasm. Strive for a better balance between work and play. Be sensitive to other people's feelings. Share your ideas with those who can help.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Choose your words carefully when discussing sensitive issues. Use your family ties to better advantage. Review all your options before making plans. Write to friends. Love will reign supreme tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A spontaneous discussion could lead to greater rappot with an influential member of the opposite sex. You need to set some specific goals for yourself. Others are eager to follow where you lead.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Unexpected developments are featured todya. Being flexible will help you through a rough period. Your business plans are strongly influenced by distant events. Doublecheck someone's figures.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Take a trip for either business or pleasure - the results will astound you. Fascinating new friendships lead to romance or higher profits. A good pal provides valuable job information. Be appreciative.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Do some serious thinking about your career. Conventional methods will work best in business. Act on your own ideas even if it would be easier to go along with the crowd. Pursue romance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Avoid all forms of gambling today and make a special effort to be nicer to family members. Release nervous energy through exercise. Travel enjoys highly favorable influences. Contact old friends.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your instincts about new people and situations are right on target. Share your thoughts with that special someone. Your powers of concentration are high. Tackle a project requiring precision.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Changes are in the works at both the office and home. Someone applauds your decisions. Study your spending patterns before revamping the family budget. Romance keeps you guessing.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): New work plans can be put into operation. Rely on your intuition when dealing with personal matters. A lack of cooperation at home could lead to some tense moments. Extend the olive branch.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The emphasis now is on making more money. Overseas contacts hold the solution to a career or financial problem. Events beyond your control could set off fireworks in the romance department.

Du Bois has followed in his stepfather's footsteps both as a teacher and a journalist. Du Bois began his career in 1960 as a professor of English literature at Cairo University.

"I was not very happy teaching at Cairo University," he said. "There was a tradition where the professor was expected to be somewhat removed from the student. The elitism on the part of the professors rubbed me the wrong way."

He said students had a strong tendency to rely completely on what a professor said, then spit back on exams exactly what the professor said. However, Du Bois said his students "rallied to his side" when he encouraged them to challenge the established traditions.

Like his stepfather, who wrote for and founded several Black publications, Du Bois decided in 1962 to become a journalist.

He became a stringer for the private Egyptian Middle East News and Features Agency, an agency which Du Bois said was created to represent news agencies that could not have representatives in Egypt.

"It was an exciting time," he said, because during the 60s, the process of independence was sweeping across Africa. Egypt was the center for several African liberation organizations, he said.

"I had access to liberation organizations and their leadership, and I was able to cover these events all over Africa," he said.

After six years of stringing, during which time he wrote about several topics including the moving of the Abusimbel Temple in Upper Egypt and Muhammed Ali's 1964 visit to Cairo, Du Bois became an announcer for Cairo Radio.

Du Bois also became a correspondent for the Pacific News Service in San Francisco, for which he is still a foreign news editor in Cairo.

Du Bois said he became familiar with UMass through individuals in the W.E.B. Du Bois African-American studies and journalism departments, and through his mother's teaching position at the University in the early 60s.

In his "Press and the Third World" course, Du Bois said he aims to "sensitize students to the failure of the U.S. media to adequately and accurately report on peoples of the Third World."

He said in his "African-American Press in the United States" course, he tries to give students an historical perspective on the emergence, role, and function of the Black press in the U.S.

Du Bois, who is the founder of the W.E.B. Du Bois foundation, and a member of the board of the Memorial Center for Pan-African Culture, said he tries to protect and promote his stepfather's legacy both in Amherst and in Cairo.

"My father was a leading figure in this country and in Africa," he said. "I want to assure that his work is not forgotten, but is passed on to younger generations."

Opportunities for Computer Science Graduates

Jump into an entry-level career that will take you places at EDS.

In an EDS developmental program, your career potential can reach new heights. You'll gain the rewarding on-the-job experience you need to move your career years ahead — experience you can only gain from a world leader in the management of information technology.

EDS is looking for achievers — people who make things happen. If you are interested in applying your talents in the information processing services industry, you won't find a better place to grow than EDS.

Our highly respected developmental programs are nationally recognized as models for the industry. They provide technical challenge, professional expertise and the business savvy you'll need to become one of the industry's best-prepared professionals.

EDS will be recruiting on campus Tuesday, February 27th for the Research Systems Engineering Development (RSED) Program.

To qualify, we ask for:

- ▶ A bachelor's degree in Computer Science with a minimum 3.5/4.0 overall GPA preferred
- ▶ Willingness to relocate to the Dallas, Texas, area
- ▶ Excellent written and oral communication skills
- ▶ Proven record of academic achievement

The RSED program instruction includes hands-on and classroom education in artificial intelligence, expert systems and advanced systems architecture. Each class uses our CASE tool, INCA, to analyze, design and build an information processing system. Students work at the EDS national headquarters in Plano, Texas. Class size is limited to 16, and students use Sun workstations and Macintosh computers for classroom instruction. Upon completion of the program, graduates are responsible for analyzing, designing, developing and building systems and tools to maintain and enhance our level of technology.

Take the first step toward achieving your highest career potential.

Douglas, Tyson prep for June rematch

Tyson-Holyfield bout likely to be cancelled

NEW YORK (AP) — Now, the boxing world agrees: Buster Douglas is heavyweight champion.

And there apparently is agreement on another front: His first challenger will be Mike Tyson.

Douglas-Tyson II came close to clearing the final hurdle Tuesday when Evander Holyfield's manager, Ken Sanders, said in Atlanta that his boxer probably would step aside to allow the rematch.

Billionaire developer Donald Trump says Douglas-Tyson II will be June 18 in Atlantic City, although Douglas has not signed a contract.

In fact, Douglas only learned hours earlier that he was undisputed champion when the World Boxing Association became the last of the sport's three major governing bodies to recognize his 10th-round knockout of Tyson on Sunday in Tokyo.

"We don't have a rematch now," Don King, Tyson's promoter and adviser, said Tuesday at a news conference. "We're trying to get one. The first thing we have to do is get a rematch. As you know, the catching comes before the hanging."

Tyson, who appeared with King at the news conference, said his loss was "a temporary, minor setback. I don't take it to heart. I'll be the champion again. I'm still one of the best fighters in the world and when the rematch comes I'll prove it."

"We've been approached to make a deal, by Don King, to step aside and make way for the rematch," Sanders said. "We're waiting for the contract for him. If that's what they said it would be, we probably would do it."

"They're just asking us to move it three or four months," Sanders said. "It's a very good deal for us. We know we're going to fight the championship."

In his hometown of Columbus, Ohio, Douglas said the main thing for him "is that I am now looked upon as the heavyweight champion of the world. It was a lifetime dream come true, and I thank God for that."

The International Boxing Federation recognized Douglas as champion immediately, and the World Boxing Council extended recognition Monday night after King, who promotes Tyson, dropped a protest of the result.

"I never asked anybody to change the decision," King said. "We just want a first shot at a rematch."

Tuesday's edition of the New York Times quoted Trump as saying: "We made a deal a little while ago" to host the Tyson-Douglas rematch. The fight could be held at Trump's Taj Mahal, scheduled for completion this spring.

Holyfield has a contract with Trump, Dan Duva and King to fight Tyson for the heavyweight championship in Atlantic City on the same date, but Tyson no longer has the belts. So, Holyfield no longer has a contract. He does, however, have the right as the No. 1 contender to the next title shot, which he apparently will waive.

Trump vice president Gary Selesner said Holyfield would fight for $3 million. He would have gotten $12 million for a Tyson fight.

"Right now, everything is in the talking stages, and negotiations are going on, but nothing is firm," Duva said. "The only thing firm is that Evander Holyfield is the mandatory challenger for Buster Douglas.

"We're not ruling it out," he said. "We're just saying everything is premature."

Men's hoop hoping to chop down GW

Minutemen looking to end string of hard luck on the A-10 road

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Let us turn back the clock to January, 1989.

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team journeyed to the nation's capital, fairly confident that it could grab a road win at the hands of George Washington University.

Do remember that at the time, the Colonials were oh-for-everything, mired in the midst of a horrendous season. No reason why the Minutemen shouldn't have been able to waltz right into the Smith Center and win going away.

Surprise. Let the record show that in GW's 1-27 season, the only win was a 103-77 pasting of our own Minutemen in that very building. Which is the topic for today's lesson about basketball in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Fact: There is no such thing as an automatic road win in this league. UMass must heed this when it returns to the scene of the crime against the Colonials at 7:30 p.m.

Those of you who took the time to chart the course of this season for UMass probably had this one penciled-in as a victory from the start. But be forewarned.

Remember what West Virginia coach Gale Catlett said after his team lost to the Minutemen at the Cage last month. Everyone was going ga-ga over the locals, projecting them for anywhere from A-10 champs, to national champs, to NBA champs (well, maybe not that far).

Anyway, the dean of Atlantic 10 coaches (which means, this guy's taken the magical mystery tour a few times, and knows what it's all about) uttered these famous words that have rattled across many a bus trip: "Wait 'til they [UMass] get on the road before I tell you how good they are."

Face it, UMass is about as snake-bitten as a team can get nowadays, especially when it ventures outside of Amherst. Of their last five road games, the resume shows a three-point loss at Penn State, a loss at Temple after UMass led by 11 early in the second half, a one-point setback at Duquesne, a four-pointer at West Virginia and then last Thursday's 66-61 defeat at Rutgers.

These are all games UMass could/should have won, but lost for various reasons. Simply put, winning on the road in the A-10 is not as easy as it looks. Ask West Virginia, which can win at home whenever it pleases, but is one vulnerable bunch of campers beyond the Morgantown city limits. Oh, yeah. Last Thursday, the Mounties came to Washington, D.C. and lost to GW by seven.

A win tonight would pretty much assure UMass that it will not have to play on Day One of the Atlantic 10 Tournament, which starts next month in Philadelphia. If GW prevails, get ready for an interesting couple of weeks.

Obviously, GW is playing better than last season. At this juncture the Colonials are 5-9 in the A-10 and 11-13 overall. One of those losses came to the Minutemen on Jan. 11, 80-61 at the Cage, in a game that was never really a blowout.

Freshman Sonni Holland has been a big addition, along with transfers Matt Nordmann and Byron Hopkins. Forward Mike Jones has been solid inside.

News out of the UMass camp says that freshman forward Tony Barbee did not make the trip to Washington. Barbee spent the night in Health Services with the flu last weekend and struggled through it Sunday against Temple. He hopes to join the team in Philadelphia, where they will play St. Joseph's on Saturday.

Hoop du jour: Senior guard Cary Herer continues to hang around as one of the top assist-getters in the land. After his 12-dish game against Temple, Herer saw his average shoot up to 8.0 per game, enough to put him 11th in the nation.

Funny though, how earlier this year he was at 7.4 apg, and was 10th in the nation . . . For those of you who just can't get enough statistics to chew on, for the second straight week UMass is ranked 100th in the USA Today power ratings compiled by MIT grad Jeff Sagarin.

Minutewomen coming off big win, face potent Lady Lion offense

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has had 24 hours to enjoy its 84-81 victory over Harvard Tuesday night.

Now the Minutewomen (4-18, 1-12 in the Atlantic 10) return to the A-10 and face Penn State, a team that has been in the Top 25 for much of the season, in a 7:30 p.m. contest at the Cage. UMass ran into the PSU buzzsaw earlier this season, losing decisively 91-58 as sophomore Susan Robinson torched them for 28 points.

What makes the Lady Lions so tough to handle is their depth. Coach Rene Portland frequently employs as many as 10 people a game.

"They're so deep on the bench," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. "They are going to keep running people at us."

This will present problems for the Minutewomen. In the victory over Harvard, Hewelt used, for the most part, the starters and Patty Robak, with Kim Kristofik also seeing a little time off the bench.

"We'll have to go deeper [in tonight's game]," said Hewelt. "We have to get more production off our bench."

In addition to a deep PSU bench Hewelt must also deal with an offensive arsenal that ranks second to none in the A-10.

"They run very well off the turnover. That's how they get a lot of their offense," said Hewelt.

"We've got to hang onto the ball and not turn it over. That's playing right into their hands."

For UMass to have any chance at victory Hewelt will have to hope that the balanced scoring that took place at Harvard will once again surface tonight. In Tuesday's win the Minutewomen placed five players in double figures.

If UMass can get that balanced scoring and combine it with the emotion that the Harvard win created, the possibility of an upset is not out of the question.

"I think our morale is up," said Hewelt. "We played well and we knew it. We just need to keep that level of intensity against Penn State. We can stay competitive with them."

Football team hauls in 17 recruits for 1990

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

While most people spent their yesterdays waiting for candy, flowers or balloons, University of Massachusetts football coach Jim Reid was expecting football players.

With yesterday being the first day that high school recruits could officially sign letters-of-intent, 17 athletes made their commitments to the Minutemen for the fall season. The following is a list of those who have signed, and the awards/honors they received in high school:

Ben Albert (NG/C); Passaic County Tech HS; Wayne, NJ: Was a first team All-State and participated in the North-South All-Star game. A two-year captain and a three-time All-League player at three different positions.

Silas Burke (LB); Algonquin Reg. HS; Northboro: Captain as a senior, also was a three-year letterwinner in track, throwing the shot put, javelin and discus.

Brian Corcoran (DT); Baker HS; Baldwinsville, NY: Captain as a senior, a first team All-State, All-Upstate and All-League, two-time Baker HS Most Outstanding Student, a three-time school MVP in hockey who participated in the Empire State Games in that sport.

Marvin Fitchett (RB); Norwalk HS; Norwalk, CT: Captain as a senior, 1988 All-City MVP, first team Bridgeport Post and honorable mention All-State, rushed for over 1,000 yards as a junior.

Chris Fricke (DT/OT); Ramapo HS; Franklin Lakes, NJ: Co-captain as a senior, played only five games but was fourth on the team in tackles, selected to second team All-League. As a junior, was first team All-League and All-Suburban.

Jason Housel (OT); Canandaigua HS; Canandaigua, NY: Captain as a senior, a first team All-League and All-State and an All-Greater Rochester. Named to Section V Eddie Meath All-Star Team. Also a three-year wrestler.

John Johnson (TB); Passaic County Tech HS; Wayne, NJ: First team All-League and All-County, third team All-State. Rushed for over 1,600 yards and three touchdowns while leading the county in scoring as a senior.

Dave McGovern (QB/DB); Bergen Catholic HS; Oradell, NJ: Completed 57 percent of his passes for 1,000 yards and nine touchdowns. A first team All-League and All-County at defensive back. Brother is defensive secondary coach Bill McGovern.

Demetrius Owens (TB); Teaneck HS; Teaneck, NJ: Co-captain as a senior, a first team All-League and second team All-County. Carried for 995 yards and 16 touchdowns. Selected as team MVP and was chosen for the North-South All-Star game.

Jon Racich (OT/DT); Cresskill HS; Cresskill, NJ: Solid blocker, helped runners gain 2,327 yards and quarterbacks throw for 1,754 yards. First team All-League and All-Bergen County, and a second team All-State, Group I.

Clark Ramos (OB/DB); E. Providence HS; E. Providence, RI: Captain as a senior, only player in RI history to be All-Class A three years in a row. Led state in passing yardage and also rushed for 800 yards.

Matt Read (RB); Cherokee HS; Marlton, NJ: Captain as a senior, rushed for 1,100 yards and scored 17 touchdowns. First Team All-Group IV, All-Burlington County and All-League. Also a three-year starter in baseball.

Karl Russell (OL); Grand Rapids JC; Grand Rapids, MI: Captain last season, came from Byron Area HS in 1986, where he was honorable mention All-State and All-Conference on both offense and defense. Also an honorable mention All-State in basketball.

Adam Silva (TB); Case HS; Swansea: Captain as a senior, was Boston Globe Division IV Player-of-the-Year, a Globe All-State in '88 and '89 and two-time Player-of-the-Week. Holds school records for yards rushing (season and career), points scored (season and career) and career touchdowns.

Matt Stefanski (TE); Brick Township HS; Bricktown, NJ: First team All-Ocean County, selected to North-South All-Star and All-Shore games.

Eric Thimas (RB); West Haven HS; West Haven, CT: Three-time All-District, two-time All-New Haven Area and a first team All-State, had 1,151 yards rushing as a senior. Holds school records for all-purpose yards, touchdowns and yards in a game.

Tony Williams (QB/TB); Randolph HS; Randolph, NJ: Captain his last two seasons, a first team All-County who also played wide receiver and defensive back. Morris County All-Sports Association Amateur Athlete-of-the-Year in '89.

OUT OF MANY ONE PEOPLE

A jammin' kick-off to World Beat Night

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Somewhere along the line, Winston Grennan got a raw deal.

When people talk of the birth of reggae, the names Bob Marley, Peter Tosh and Jimmy Cliff immediately come to mind. But it is Grennan who is credited with creating the reggae sound.

The inspiration came when the former undefeated welterweight (32-0) heard the waves on Helsha Beach in Jamaica. From this soothing rhythm, Grennan created scores of songs. These were eventually covered by Marley ("Rock My Boat" and "Simmerdown"), Toots and the Maytals ("Funky Kingtown" and "Louis-Louis") and Jimmy Cliff ("The Harder They Come").

Grennan played with all these reggae greats. But because he plays the drums, probably the most underappreciated instrument in music, his achievements and driving beats have been largely overlooked.

But not by his contemporaries in the music world. In addition to countless reggae stars, Grennan has also pounded the skins for the likes of The Rolling Stones, Paul Simon (on "Cecilia" and "Mother and Child Reunion"), Cat Stevens, Dizzy Gillespie and Marvin Gaye.

The laid back "Godfather of Reggae Drums" was more than content to sit back while his peers hogged the spotlight. But things are beginning to change.

In 1983, Grennan formed the Ska Rocks Band, and created a new type of music he calls "sweggae" (ryhmes with "segue"); a combination of Caribbean rhythms and American pop music.

He then cut "Savior," for the movie 9½ Weeks. It was played in the scene where Mickey Rourke and Kim Basinger meet for the first time. But the song was conspicuously absent from the soundtrack, because an agreement could not be reached with the record company.

After keyboardist Dwight Brewster joined the band in 1987, Ska Rocks entered the studio and produced the energetic At the Border. Grennan, who wrote and arranged all the songs, has had trouble finding a label to release the album in America, but in Europe, led by the hit single "Talawa," it is a monster seller. If there's any justice in our country, it will do just as well here.

When Winston Grennan and the Ska Rocks Band take the stage at Twister's this Saturday, they will kick-off World Beat Night at the club, which will be held every Saturday thereafter.

"We wanted to expand our live entertainment format and keep room for fresh entertainment," explained Twister's owner Mark Forsyth. "There's a big demand for Latin music in the Valley."

Uproot and Yes Brazil are booked for future World Beat Nights. They should help to bring this music, largely created by Winston Grennan, to the wanting ears of the area.

Psycho-surreal Muses will make you ''Dizzy''

By CYNTHIA CONRAD
Collegian Correspondent

"I want to fight the clouds with your head on a stick/fight the bush with your water and your leaves . . ." sings Kristin Hersh in "Drive," from Throwing Muses' House Tornado.

Throwing Muses are as ambitious and daring as these lines from Hersh's poetry/lyrics suggest. Through four albums and an EP, Throwing Muses has continued to inspire, puzzle and astound critics and cult audiences with death-defying vocals and psycho-surrealist lyrics. On Friday night, Pearl Street Cafe in Northampton will host the diverse, unique Boston band.

With the release of their 1989 LP, Hunkpapa, the Muses began their rise from cult status to international acclaim. Their single, "Dizzy," one of their more polished, accessible songs, received considerable airplay both on MTV and commercial radio stations.

"We knew we could make a record that people could listen to, that could get played on the radio, and still do it with integrity," Hersh explained. "The music we've done prior to this has been complex, with lots of countermelody and interplay. The rule of thumb this time out was to cut everything in half and then cut that in half. We wanted to purify, not simplify, to give the music space and the listener an opportunity to get inside the sound."

Their strength, however, lies in the early material that put Hersh into the "Unusual Female Vocalist" realm, along with such unique talents as Kate Bush and Sinead O'Connor.

Yet the band's music eludes categorization, at once richly textured, haunting, icy, tough, moody and whimsical. The content of earlier songs, most notably on their self-titled 4AD LP, often changes midstream, creating Hersh's captivating vocals, David Narcizo's trademark marching band snare, guitarist/vocalist Tanya Donelly and bassist Leslie Langston create an aesthetically unusual style that is the Muses' alone.

The history of Throwing Muses goes back to the early 80s, when, at the age of 14, Hersh and Donelly taught each other to play guitar. While Hersh pursued a major in philosophy and psychology and Donelly in archaeology at college in Boston, they began performing the Boston/Providence club circuit. The addition of California-native Langston was a definite asset, possessing diverse musical experience in heavy metal, reggae, classical, jazz and Portugese polka bands. Narcizo, not surprisingly, had been a marching band member previous to joining the Muses.

Live, the Muses demonstrate their diversity by including material from all stages for the band's career and a single show can range in mood from detached and atmospheric to danceable. Whether you missed last semester's Sept. 28 show or are seeking music that transcends the usual alternative slush, Throwing Muses is a band worth exploring.

Jumping and dancing to help the homeless

By M.J. MURPHY
Collegian Correspondent

This Saturday, Bricker's in Greenfield offers an event to get up and jump around for, as it plays host to the first annual Jump to Benefit the Family Inn Homeless Shelter. This evening of dance and comedy features Roger Salloom & the Stragglers, a band that combines an eclectic upbeat mixture of reggae, R&B and Motown.

While still in his teens, Roger Salloom began his musical career with the band, Salloom, Sinclair and the Mother Bear back in the 60s. With a socialist slant and rave reviews, their self-titled soulful debut album marked the first time an all-White album had been signed by Chess Records.

Signed under the management team of Jake Rohrer and Stu Cook of Creedence Clearwater Revival, Salloom recorded Would You Like To Meet Someone? in New England in 1983. Containing the ever-famous single of Salloom's hometown, "Out of Worcester," the album became one of the most popular local recordings of that year. It was also chosen as record-of-the-week on Boston's WBCN as well as Best Album of 1983 in the Valley Advocate's Readers Poll. Roger Salloom & the Stragglers were once again chosen by the Advocate's Reader's Poll in 1986 for Best Band.

Opening for Roger Salloom & The Stragglers for the nostalgic soul is Andy Jaffe & Gisele L'Italien Quartet. Having played with Duke Ellington, this jazz group is famed for their great standards from the 30s and 40s. The benefit will also feature political comedian Chris O'Carroll and WRSI's Buddy Rubbish as Master of Ceremonies.

All proceeds for the show are going towards the Family Inn Homeless Shelter. The homeless are the largest growing population in the United States, an issue which can no longer be ignored. The Family Inn, under the direction of the tireless Tom Salter, serves 21 towns in the Franklin County Area. In their three years of existence, the shelter has managed to place 162 families in descent, affordable housing.

Salter said that the average stay at the shelter for a family is 10 to 12 weeks. Unfortunately, due to state and federal budget problems, people may be forced to stay longer. "There's just not a whole lot of affordable housing out there," he said.

But the eight-person staff at the shelter have been doing all they can. Ninety-five percent of the people they put into housing are still living where they were placed. And, out of 102 family shelters in the state, the Family Inn was voted number one, based on their services and placement.

Bricker's is donating the room for this event. Greenfield Community College is donating the staging, and H-Copy donated its ticket-printing services. Tickets for the benefit are $6.

Smith Corona presents three products that can help make schoolwork academic.

The Smith Corona PWP 2000 Personal Word Processor is in a class by itself. It's so compact it can fit in the most compact dorm room. Yet, thanks to features like a built-in disk drive, 100,000 character DataDisk capacity, and a crystal clear display, it makes it easy to transform B's into A's.

For those who prefer an electronic typewriter, the Smith Corona XD 4600 is the typewriter of preference. With its 16 character display and approximately 7,000 characters of editable memory, you can have the convenience of word processing features with the simplicity of a typewriter.

Of course, the pocket-size Spell-Right™ 300P also comes with impeccable references. In this case, a built-in electronic dictionary, a thesaurus, a calculator, even a collection of challenging word games.

So if you're thinking Magna Cum Laude at the end of this year, don't forget to think Smith Corona at the beginning of this year.

B.D.P. has their rap attack in full effect

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

When it comes to acknowledging powerful rap acts, the likes of Public Enemy, Ice-T and the Jungle Brothers seem to dominate the praise, however, few have been willing to complement B.D.P., Boogie Down Productions, a rap group worthy of association with "hard-driving rap" groups.

KRS-ONE and the rest of his troupe are among the most hardcore in the current wave of politically conscious rap, and are finally receiving the mega-popularity they deserve. B.D.P. come across just as strong (if not stronger) in their message, and rely just as much on the heavy beats. Lovers of hip-hop will love their latest release on Jive records, Ghetto Music: The Blueprint of Rap. It's got some vicious beats that keep the asses movin' and the crowds screamin'.

For those focusing on politics, this album features plenty of social-commentary and important information all geared towards uplifting and uniting the race.

Mastermind and founder of the B.D.P. project is KRS-ONE (Knowledge Reigns Supreme Over Nearly Everyone). Apart from running B.D.P., he is also the head of the famed Stop the Violence movement, an important organization whose members are popular rap artists and important Black figures, motivated in getting youth and parents involved in abolishing gangs, drugs and the violence the plagues the troubled Black neighborhoods of America.

This past summer, the group, which features the righteous contributions of Public Enemy, put out a single and made a video titled "Self Destruction." All of the proceeds from the single went to the Stop The Violence movement, and KRS-ONE is currently on tour with this movement, of which B.D.P. are a part.

B.D.P. have made three albums, two of which are still available. Their 1986 debut LP Criminal Minded, sold an impressive number of copies and enjoyed massive airplay. However, due to contractual disputes, royalties were not seen by anyone but the executives of the record company who released it. Due to strange circumstances, the record on the whole is unobtainable.

Record distributors have been having trouble finding anyone who deals with B-Boy's (the label that spotted Criminal Mended) distributors, making anyone who owns a copy very lucky.

B.D.P., tolerating their loss and determined to continue, signed to major-label Jive records and recorded By All Means Necessary. This LP gained them not only overwhelming popularity, but critical praise from journalists writing for musical and non-musical oriented publications. Memorable cuts from that particular album include "My Philosophy," "Stop the Violence," and "Necessary," a poem recited over sparse beats.

The first single off of the album, "My Philosophy," sold over 200,000 copies within the first 12 days of its initial release. Another classic B.D.P. cut is "Illegal Business Controls America," featuring samples from the old (and debateably racist) Fat Albert cartoon series.

Now with the arrival of their new LP, the success of the Stop the Violence single, and the healthy response to their concert here last year, the troupe have decided to return for yet another gig in the Five College area. They'll play at John M. Greene Hall at 8 p.m. Tickets are still on sale at Main Street Records and For the Record in Amherst, and cost $15 for the general public, $12 for Five College students with I.D. (if you don't bring your I.D. you could be subject to an additional $3 surcharge).

Those who approve of this event should thank the sisters at the Black Student Alliance of Smith College for making it possible.

James Cotton brings his blues harp to Pearl Street Saturday night

Blues legend Cotton comes to Pearl Street

By JODY GABIN
and AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, Feb. 17, legendary blues artist James Cotton performs along with his All-Star Blues Band at Pearl Street in Northampton.

Cotton was 15-years-old when he was discovered by Muddy Waters. He was performing with Howlin' Wolf in West Memphis, Arkansas, when Waters came through town looking for a harmonica player. Something between the two clicked, because Cotton ended up staying with Waters for 12 years.

Cotton's raw, powerful, Delta-based blues was the perfect complement to Waters' sound. Throwing himself entirely into his performances with Waters, Cotton added an aggression and emotional intensity to the band that quickly became a standard in Chicago blues. Having developed a sound reputation for himself with Waters', Cotton was an immediate success when he left in 1966 to front his own band.

Throughout the 60s and 70s, Cotton's influence expanded beyond the blues circuit. He taught musicians such as Paul Butterfield and Peter Wolf, and influenced guitarists such as Bonnie Raitt and Steve Miller. Janis Joplin invited Cotton to tour with her twice, an honor she reserved for him only. In the late 70s, Cotton recorded with Johnny Winter and Steve Miller, and toured with Winter and Waters for six weeks.

Cotton is still enjoying success today. This year, he has been nominated for three Grammy Awards that include albums (Take Me Back and Live at Antone's) in the Best Contemporary Blues and the Best Traditional Blues categories.

In 1988, he won the W.C. Handy International Blues Award for Best Instrumentalist/Harmonica.

Today, Cotton continues to tour constantly, most often with his band, but at times with a more traditional trio that includes such greats as Pinetop Perkins and Dr. John on keyboards.

For his current "Take Me Back Tour," Cotton has assembled a band of Chicago blues veterans. Guitarist Luther Tucker has played with Muddy Waters and Little Walter. Bassist Ike Anderson has shared the stage with Buddy Guy and Junior Wells. Guitarist Bob Margolin and drummer Ray Allison were both in Muddy Waters' band.

No matter what band Cotton performs with, he continues to play the blues with a depth of feeling and emotional intensity that's virtually unmatched in the blues world today. Cotton reportedly blew the top right of his harmonica during one recent session: "Just warming up," was his response. For blues fans, it'd be a crime to miss Cotton's show Saturday night.

This is a special announcement from the wednesday night graphics staff. Firstly, congratulations to you if you are able to squint hard enough to read this. Oh well, its late and this is just a silly filler that I'm wasting time creating so you can waste time reading it. Maybe we can now go on to do more valuable things after this. Ahem. Thank you.

Local bands show they have a heart

By WILLIAM GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

Two of the most noticeable aspects of the Valley music scene is its heart and talent. There's a seemingly endless resevoir of kindness on the part of artists, to play for a multitude of differing causes.

And the better talent seems to play the benefits most often, avoiding the trapping of playing only for money that too many bands on the lamer side fall into.

Tomorrow night, both the heart and talent of the Valley will play a six-hour set at Pearl Street in Northampton, to benefit the Housing Discrimination Project in Holyoke and the Hampshire Community Action Commission, two organizations committed to helping the homeless and the needy.

But this isn't just any six hours of live music. The evening will include Joe Keenan, Johnny Cruz, the Rent Party, the Herschler Brothers, the Sighs, the Ray Mason Band and the Dirtonz. All of these are bands that can and do command the best of performance prices in the Valley, with good reason, and all of them are playing for free.

The woman behind all the excitement is Kathy Fletcher, the coordinator of the Housing Discrimination Project in Holyoke. The new program, that fights all forms of housing discrimination, needs support, and Fletcher put on the show in response to that need.

"It's the easiest way to get support," she said. "These people are my friends, and they're all good people, people who are willing to help out."

Fletcher is not new to benefits. In 1986, she was behind the Jam for Bread to support Jessie's House, a woman's shelter in Northampton. There was also the show in support of the Northampton Survival Center, as well as a number of others.

Fletcher formerly ran the Amherst Shelter. She said she saw a lot of discrimination while there. "Amherst might seem liberal, but the minute they find out you're on welfare . . . there's this stereotype of people on welfare that's very much believed by the people of Amherst."

She remembers trying to get Hispanics and other minorities into housing. "They would call and call and get no results, and then I'd call, and get treated 100 percent better."

"We live in a very segregated community that's racial on a lot of different levels. The Northampton/Amherst area has become so gentrified that a lot of local people have moved out," she said.

"Can you believe that up to three months ago it was legal for landlords to kick gays out of their house because they were gays?" Fletcher asked, refering the very recent law banning such discrimination. It is this discrimination that Fletcher is currently fighting.

Aside from the obvious amount of frustration her job gives her, there is a great amount of hope.

"All of these people were willing to do it for free. It makes me feel there is hope for this community. The postering, the commercials, the bands, the space, all of this was done by professionals, and all were donated for free."

Chuck Papert shot a funky, crisp commercial/video that is currently airing on MTV and seven other stations. The ad took four days to shoot, but all participants, including Papert (who's as good on sax with Free Press as he is with a steady-cam) and Anne Harrison, the commercial's producer, donated their time and effort.

Twenty percent of the profits from the show will go to Jenny's Fund at the Hampshire Community Action Commission, a program that assists people living in the streets. The other 80 percent will go to the Discrimination Project.

Health Services

Effective January 29, 1990

Dear Student Health Plan and Family Plan Members:

The University Health Services is pleased to announce that the Student Health Fee for spring semester 1990 will not be increased. Services will also not be reduced.

However, in order to do this we will need to institute an increase in copayments for three services for all student health plan members who pay the Basic Student Health Fee or belong to our Student Family Plan and related special plans. The new copayments are:

1. Pharmacy - three-tiered system of $5, $7, and $15.
2. Dental Care - full charges for routine and preventive care.
3. Eye Care - complete optometric examination charge of $40.

These changes are directly related to the state budget deficit, since we have been notified that beginning January 1, 1990 UHS will be charged full fringe benefits costs for its employees. This amounts to $1.5 million per year, or $750,000 unexpected unbudgeted costs for Spring 1990. Through staff attrition and a tighter budget we can absorb about 50% of this amount. However, a $350,000 deficit remains. The increased copayments will cover most of this.

We regret that we have to make this change so suddenly.

Sincerely,

David P. Kraft

GEO votes to hold one-day work stoppage

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization voted overwhelmingly last night to hold a one-day work stoppage on March 1 to demonstrate its determination for union recognition to the University.

With approximately 91 percent of the vote, the GEO also officially requested from its affiliate, the United Auto Workers, authorization to hold a strike after the work stoppage.

If the GEO receives the strike authorization from the UAW, the membership could vote on March 1 to enter into a full-fledged strike or, if negotiations seemed positive, to postpone or not hold a strike.

On a voice vote, the GEO formally rejected the administration's proposed contract. But, on a separate vote, the organization decided to send its negotiation team back to the table.

Gerald McCausland, a member of GEO's negotiating team, said they plan to use the authorization as a bargaining chip when they return to negotiations with the University.

Before the secret ballot vote on the work stoppage and Student trustee linked to additional wrongdoing

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima, who reportedly used telephones in the SGA office to contact registered student voters prior to the Feb. 3 caucus for the gubernatorial Democratic Nominating Convention, also may have made campaign posters for Evelyn Murphy on the computer in the SGA office at an earlier date, said SGA Treasurer Laura Filkins Wednesday.

Nakajima, who was elected a delegate from the Murphy slate, said he started to make posters on the computer. The student trustee added that he believed his actions were completely legal, and an exercise of his First Amendment rights.

Filkins, who was working in the SGA office during both reported instances, said she asked Nakajima to stop the alleged activity, which she said he did.

"I knew there was a vague policy that seemed to imply that our equipment should not be used for political activities," Filkins said.

On Feb. 7, the Collegian reported that in addition to Nakajima, Commuter Area governing board members Robb Smith, Ted Chambers, and Brian Crawford were under investigation by the student attorney general and the SGA president for the possible "misuse of capital equipment."

Crawford, who said he was in the hospital during the times of the phone calls, was the only one of the four to deny using the telephones in the SGA office.

According to Brad Balzer, spokesperson for the Office of Campaign and Political Finance, "Chapter 55, [of the General Laws of Massachusetts], pursuant to Anderson v. Boston, provides that the actions of using governmental resources to favor a political candidate would not be permitted; it would be prohibited under Chapter 55.

"The court said [in Anderson v. Boston] that telephones and copiers, for all intents and purposes owned or leased by the Commonwealth are government resources," Balzer said.

The Office of Campaign and Political Finance is the governmental commission responsible for enforcing Chapter 55. Investigative findings are referred to the state attorney general for prosecution.

Filkins said she also saw Michael Greiner, UMass alumnus and field coordinator for the Evelyn Murphy campaign, and a UMass student using the laser printer in the SGA Communication office during intersession. She said there was a "very distinct possibility" that he was printing posters for Murphy's campaign.

Greiner could not be reached for comment.

Michael Sullivan, University Controller and Director of Finance said, "Everything the University purchases becomes property of the Commonwealth." An SGA computer paid from the Student Activity Trust Fund is an asset of the University, he said.

The matter has been brought to the attention of the Dean of Students Office, which could not be reached for comment.

Mark Longabaugh, campaign manager for Evelyn Murphy, said the lieutenant governor occasionally makes political calls from her office and reimburses the state.

"If some phone calls were inadvertently placed, we would be happy to reimburse the University for whatever expense it incurred."

Benjamin A. Barnes, counsel for Nakajima, said he believed that "the Anderson case deals only with state employees."

Court rejects DOD protesters' defense

Northampton judge cites lack of credible evidence in refusal

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, Northampton District Court Judge Edward Shea rejected the attempted use of the "necessity defense" by four defendants arrested at the University of Massachusetts in April for protesting Department of Defense funded research.

UMass alumnus Jay Allain, UMass student Jonathan Leavitt, graduate student John Langford and Hampshire College student Randy Viscio represented themselves before Shea, and explained the "necessity defense," as well as a defense based on international law.

With the first defense, the four would try to prove that their actions were necessary in order to prevent a greater harm from occurring, said Allain.

By using international law, any action they took would be protected by an international law that overrides state law.

Shea refused these two, stating there was a lack of credible evidence and did not meet the criteria for these defenses.

UMass professor of history Milton Cantor was expected to testify on behalf of the four men should Shea agree to their defense. Cantor feels that the defendants had legitimate ground to use the defense they proposed.

On the basis of a decision made in The Hague, Netherlands in 1925 and eventually adopted by the United States in 1972, Cantor said the US is "not to engage in the research, production, and use of biological weapons."

The case is scheduled to continue Thursday in Northampton District Court.

"[The week] offers us a breather and time to consult lawyers. At this point, it's not at all clear what kind of a defense we'll be able to put forth," said Allain.

strike authorization, Daniel Livingson, president of District 65/UAW, announced that should the GEO strike on March 1, the union would pay full strike benefits to all GEO members .

Carol Knox, vice president of District 65/UAW, said "People understand given the state of negotiations that a message had to be sent to management."

"They are not strike happy," she said. "But people are prepared to do whatever it takes."

McCausland said he hoped the resolution would prod the administration back to the table with a favorable contract.

"With this resolution we have tried to put the ball into the University's court," he said. "We hope the University comes to the table with new proposals."

McCausland said negotiations broke off on Wednesday over the issues of union recognition, curriculum fee waivers for research assistants, and the apparent lack of enforcement of any contract reached with the University.

The administration has maintained that the University cannot negotiate with a union following the 1979 Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission finding that stated it would be inappropriate for a union to represent graduate students.

Since the GEO is affiliated with the UAW, the University has refused to sign a contract with GEO.

Provost Richard O'Brien said the University would negotiate with any organization representing graduate student employees not affliated with a third party such as the UAW.

"By law we cannot sign an agreement with auto workers," he said. "We still want to talk to graduate students but not with auto workers."

O'Brien said a strike could create "real problems" for the University but administration with the help of department heads could probably deal with it.

"We will appeal to the students not to strike and to perform their duties," he said. "But I can't imagine that TAs would go to such an extreme [action] to join up with auto workers."

THE ROAD NOT TAKEN — A closed bridge in Hadley rests undisturbed in the February sun.

Test may help monitor bulimia

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

A blood test used to monitor diseases of the pancreas, such as alcoholism, may now be used to detect and monitor bulimia, according to a study by the National Institute of Mental Health. The test reflects the blood levels of the enzyme amylase, which the body creates to break down starches, or carbohydrates.

Researchers at the National Institutes of Mental Health in Bethesda, Maryland found that some bulimic patients exhibit abnormally high levels of amylase in their bloodstream.

Arleen Thomson, a nutritionist at University of Massachusetts Health Services, said this test somewhat parallels another test that already is used to detect bulimia. This blood test examines potassium, not amylase levels.

Potassium levels can fluctuate according to what [bulimics] are eating, or if they are vomiting" said Thomson, adding "this [new] test may be more effective."

Thomson said blood tests are important because bulimia is often detected through physical examinations. "It is really important for people who have an eating problem to seek help because the earlier people come in, the more we can do for them," she added.

A bulimic may binge, or ingest huge amounts of food, then vomit intentionally, or use laxatives to rid the body of food. Some bulimics shift from binging to anorexia and heavy dieting.

Anorexics may be intensely afraid of being overweight, rejecting food even when they are severely underweight, she said.

Thomson said it is common to alternate between the two since, "Dieting is like putting a straight-jacket on, but they can't withstand that so they binge." She advised, "Dieting encourages the opposite reaction of binging — so never diet!"

"For a lot of people [an eating disorder] starts off with a desire to be thin" said Thomson, adding "Their is a huge message from society to be thin and to eat." She noted the juxtaposition of diet articles, with pictures of fattening deserts, found in most women's magazines. "This double message can make people confused about eating" she said.

Thomson said a high incidence of eating disorders at the University and others is due to the fact that the majority of women with bulimia are college-aged. Although bulimia does effect men, Thomson reports that 95 percent of all bulimics are women.

For help with an eating disorder, the University offers drop in groups, in room 304 of Health Services. The groups meet from 5:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. Thursdays for discussion.

Another self-help group is currently meeting Monday nights from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m. at the Campus Center.

March brings an education series with viewpoints and advice from nutritionists, psychologists, and health educators to the Campus Center.

The Everywoman's Center also offers free counseling for eating disorders, on campus. Off-campus, Leslea Newman conducts a workshop entitled, "What are you eating/What's eating you?", which deals with bulimia through creative writing.

Ludlow Hospital offers family couseling, for those affected by anorexia or bulimia, on Tuesday nights for $25 per session, per group.

Forum stresses action in pollution problem

By LINDSAY HOADLEY
Collegian Correspondent

Although concern for pollution in our oceans is growing, citizen and governmental participation in correcting the problems is lacking, a University of Massachusetts professor of agriculture and resource economics said yesterday.

"Generally, the problem is coastal in nature, but our approaches to dealing with it are fragmented and uncoordinated," said David Storey at the Environmental Awareness Forum. "There is no quick and easy answer to the problem which has many dimensions beyond the control of any one country. A way to start is to determine how much damage is done and then assess how to deal with it."

Marine pollution, oil, plastics, heavy metals, sewage, and chemicals such as PCB's and DDT are the primary types of harmful materials, said Storey. These materials are either left on land and washed away by the tides, or dumped, deliberately or accidentally, into the water by ocean vessels.

Storey said ocean problems are of global interest.

"With vessel-caused pollution in international waters, we need international agreement of how to deal with these problems," Storey said. "We need a much more serious action on the international as well as national level in dealing with pollution in the ocean."

The forum, sponsored by the Mortar Board, a national honor society of UMass seniors, also featured speakers on topics such as air pollution, development of effective environmental policies, and recycling issues.

Storey was the first of seven speakers at the forum.

Alcohol program begins

By LAVINIA GAMMON
Collegian Correspondent

The second annual Five College Alcohol Awareness Week is scheduled to kick off today with a dance party at Hampshire College.

Next week different events, performances, and educational programs aimed toward alcohol and drug education will be held at the University of Massachusetts, Hampshire College, Smith College, Mount Holyoke College, and Amherst College.

For the past six years there has been a National Alcohol Awarenes Week in October. The alcohol and drug advisors from the Health Services departments in the five-college area felt that a Five College sponsored alcohol awareness week would be a fun and educational way to talk to students about the dangers, laws, and misconceptions of alcohol and drugs.

This project is sponsored by the Five College Alcohol Awareness Project, which is chaired by UMass Health Advisor Karen Jacobus, and the Northampton Saving Lives Program. This week is funded by the Five Colleges Health Servies. Each college includes this alcohol awareness program in it's yearly budget. The students that are involved have volunteered their time.

The week will center around the theme "Is Alcohol the Key to Your Social Life? Consider Alternatives." Students involved in this year's awareness week examined the role alcohol plays in campus life and felt that this theme was one students could identify with.

The organizers believe that alcohol and drugs play a large role in many students' social lives. They are hoping the activities and information offered will cause students to take a serious look at just how dependent their social lives are upon alcohol.

An information table will be set up at least one of the five colleges every day. Several students who have been trained in alcohol awarness education courses will run these information booths. Pamphlets on alcohol and drug dependencies and other educational material will be available for students to take.

Along with these information tables, several of the colleges will display crashed cars and sponsor recovering students discussion panels.

A one-hour comic medly on alcohol and drug abuse called "Drunks on Vaudeville," is scheduled to be performed in the Hatch at noon on Wednesday.

The schedule of UMass events is as follows: Tuesday, Feb 20: recovering student panel-Campus Center Rm. 178, 7-8:30 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 21: Information Table - Campus Center. Crash car - in front of Student Union. "Drunks on Vaudeville" - Hatch, 12 noon.

BOG unveils undergrad election guidelines

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

The Board of Governors formally announced its undergraduate election guidelines last night, setting a March 1 deadline for candidates to submit nomination papers.

The undergraduate election, scheduled for Tuesday, March 13, will put 17 BOG seats up for grabs. The constituency breakdown is as follows: at large (7), Commuter Area (3), Southwest Residential Area (2), Orchard Hill, Central, Sylvan and Northeast Residential Areas (1 each), and Greek Area (1).

According to the BOG guidelines, potential candidates must obtain 25 signatures from students in their constituency. Nomination forms are now available at the Board of Governors' office, Campus Center room 817.

The guidelines also define campaign rules, establishing grounds for disqualifying candidates who misrepresent themselves on posters, tamper with their opponents' posters, or campaign within 50 feet of the polls.

In other developments last night, the BOG:

- Unanimously voted Heather Tupper as the new vice-chairperson. Tupper will fill the vacancy created last week when Vice-Chairperson Liz Hart resigned.
- Postponed a motion to raise the salary of cable coordinators in the Union Video Center from $3.75 to $4.00 an hour. The motion was delayed for one week to allow the Board time to examine the UVC budget.
- Approved the new "BOG Program Council Guidelines," regarding funding requests for Registered Student Organization sponsored events.

The BOG debated for nearly an hour over the wording of guideline -6, which originally stated, "Each [funding] proposal will be reviewed on its own merits and judged upon the extent to which it promotes cultural diversity and educates the campus community."

A proposed amendment by Gov. Bill Hewitt to eliminate the diversity and education requirements was defeated 6-5. Hewitt said those requirements narrow the BOG's options.

"The groups which offer the most to the community should get the funds," he said.

Gov. Beth Dacey defended the education/diversity phrase.

"The concerns of minority students should not be pushed aside to sponsor a juggler," she said.

The BOG finally reached a compromise, inserting the words "and/or" between "diversity and educates." The compromise motion unanimously.

Pioneer Valley vulnerable to pollution, speakers say

By LINDSAY HOADLEY
Collegian Correspondent

"When we're urged to stay in our homes and not jog or play ball in the summertime because of the poor quality of the air, we're imprisoning ourselves to pollution" said the coordinator of the Citizens for a Quality Environment.

Sylvia Olman urged the public to become involved in environmental issues immediately, asserting that environmental hazards affect us daily. Olman spoke yesterday as part of the Environmental Awareness Forum.

We are particularly vulnerable to air pollution because of the nature of the area we live in, Olman said.

"Pollution knows no boundaries," she said, "If pollution is in one town, it goes all over. One thing to consider is the topography of this area. By being in a 'bowl effect,' air is trapped in the Pioneer Valley and we are more at risk to the dangers of air pollution."

"Statistics show that children and the elderly in our area have higher incidences of respiratory tract disorders,' she added.

David Keith, member of Valley Citizens for a Safe Environment, spoke following Olman at the forum. According to Keith, local pollution and associated problems can be largely attributed to Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee.

"The military is the biggest polluter of our area. and one of the biggest problems in dealing with the military is you're dealing with the government. No government or civilian is supervising pollution being done by the military." Keith said.

Keith emphasized that military spending that might be spent solving environmental problems is instead being spent, in huge amounts, on the very planes that cause so much local pollution. '112 million dollars a year goes to maintenance alone of the military planes' he said.

Keith strongly urges the public to look more closely at the role of the military in local air pollution. 'The military is really a huge polluter.' he said. 'Without any monitoring they do whatever they want to. If enough people begin to investigate and look at thir local military base, I'm convinced they'll find that there's tremendous contamination.

Keith described the military practices in the environment as 'an ongoing environmental disaster that can be stopped.' He said. 'They need to be made to account,' he said, 'because they're not doing it now.'

Campaign ads deceiving

The 1990 election year was barely a month old when voters got their first taste of negative advertising. The people of Massachusetts deserve better. With credibility in state government at an all-time low, the public needs to know that they are hearing the truth. Candidates must do their homework. They must run honest, forward-looking campaigns if we are to restore sanity to our state.

Stan Rosenberg

We can only hope that last week's radio ad will be the first and last of its type.

The ad, no longer being aired, was run by a candidate for governor and tried to perpetuate the myth that Massachusetts' public colleges and universities are top-heavy with administrators. It said our campuses have even more administrators than faculty. In fact, nothing could be further from the truth. And the truth was readily available to anyone willing to look.

Faculty far outnumber administrators and managers six to one.

Even if you counted all public higher education employees (everyone from faculty and maintenance workers to dining hall staff and administrators), Massachusetts ranks second lowest in the country in per capita employment. When you look at employee-to-student ratio, Massachusetts' public colleges and universities rank the fifth lowest in the country.

That doesn't sound like fat and waste. It sounds like another instance where state government is doing an admirable job, but the facts are being ignored and distorted time and again by the very people who seek to lead our state as elected officials.

Why do candidates run misleading ads? Because they think they can fool the people. They may, for a while — maybe even long enough to get elected. But eventually the truth comes out and the person loses credibility.

Consider the Bush campaign's memorable "Boston Harbor" ad in 1988. Despite what George Bush claimed during his presidential campaign, he had absolutely no intention of cleaning up Boston Harbor — the budget he submitted last week left no question about that.

Bush also said he wanted to be the "Education President." But the budget he submitted last week does little to support education in America, with most federal programs not even keeping pace with inflation.

Here in Massachusetts, the state's budget deficit and ways to address it will continue to dominate this year's campaign. But we are grappling with a political crisis as well as a fiscal one. We must respond to both.

So far, candidates have spoken more than anything about how they can restore credibility to state government. If that's really their goal, they can start by making honesty, accuracy and credibility a mainstay for their campaigns.

This campaign must become the bridge which leads us from the anger and chaos now clouding our state to the solid ground where we can again look to our elected officials as credible leaders — no matter which office they hold or seek, or which party they represent.

Representative Stan Rosenberg of Amherst is a member of the Legislature's Committee on Education.

Drummer beats to false merits

As a former publicist for Winston Grennan, (who was recently covered in the Collegian's, "This Weekend,"Feb. 15), I am dismayed by his apparent need to disseminate false information to boost attendance at his upcoming Twister's engagement.

Grennan entered the Kingston music scene as a taxi driver chauffeuring real talent like Tommy McCook and the Skatellites. Because he had some ability as a drummer, he was sometimes employed at Studio One. He may indeed have spent some time beating his sticks on Hellshire Beach, but he is far from being the "originator of the reggae beat." That title should go to groups like the Heptones and the early Wailers, with whom Grennan played only very infrequently.

Tunes like "Funky Kingston," "Simmer Down," and "The Harder They Come" are not covers of Grennan's work, but were written by the artists who originally performed those tunes — Toots Hibbert, the Wailers, and Jimmy Cliff, respectively.

Mention of Grennan's name in these same circles today produces not respectful nods but downcast eyes and snickers. His solo career was virtually necessitated by his overdeveloped ego, use-'em-and-lose-'em mentality, and irresponsible attitude.

While I was representing him, he blew off a gig at Pearl Street for personal reasons totally unrelated to his performance. He never even notified the club manager until an hour before show time.

Grennnan's claim to foundational membership in Jamaican musical groups of the early sixties becomes suspect when he gives his age as 37! Was he wiping the baby food from his chin between drum licks?

Grennan's recent releases, "At The Border" and his latest, cassette-only collection "Combine Nations" are far from being the monster sellers that he claims. His bitterness toward his peers for his lack of recognition is gratuitous at best in a highly competitive business. If reggae drummers are so neglected, what about Sly Dunbar, who came on the scene somewhat later than Grennan? Grennan should let his drumming speak for itself, and stand or fall on his own merits, not the borrowed glory of better artists.

Hybrid meat bogus treat

The science world was recently rocked as a new species of mammal was discovered, catalogued and implemented in our society.

Food science engineers at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst slaved long and hard.

Peter Kasperowicz

These brilliant and dedicated engineers successfully jumped through genetic hoops and basically grossed everybody out when they introduced the world to the "fowlus-bigapeus," otherwise known as the Chicken G'rilla.

I had a chance to speak with some of the scientists involved in this state-funded project.

"We're still really in the development stage, even though we've actually market-tested the product in the D.C.s," said one fellow who wished to remain nameless.

"Right about now, the creatures are circular in shape, basically immobile due to their high body fat percentage and hopelessly ugly."

On the way out, I talked to one of the custodians.

"University Food Service is messed. All they do is sit around day after day trying to figure out how to combine two different kinds of meat into one patty. Bogus."

After speaking with some of the students, I realized that there were, and still are, many mind-boggling questions left to be answered.

I spoke briefly with John MacLeod, a freshman here at UMass.

"It was all right, I guess. I ate most of it. But when I went to bus my tray, I wasn't sure if I had to throw the bones in the barrel. Hell, I wasn't sure if there were any bones at all. It tasted all right . . .kind of like chicken."

Many were confused about the name of the animal. For example, since "Chicken" comes before "G'rilla", is chicken an adjective, describing the g'rilla?

Are we eating "chickeny" g'rilla meat?

Or vice versa?

Is it good grammar to make "g'rilla" a contraction?

No one is sure.

"They're really cool," says sophomore Ian Knox.

"If you take 'em outside, you can throw'em like a shingle, like Chicken G'rilla Stars. The things really fly — much farther than the pucks do."

Many students indicated to me that they would like to occupy a building or something until more is known on the subject.

"It's just not fair to us," says sophomore Steve Hackenburg. "This might be an animal that we want to protect. Maybe a wild Chicken G'rilla preserve, or legislation, or something. But we know nothing about how this animal lives. It's probably not even worth saving. . ."

Chicken G'rillas.

Due to the lack of submissions, the forum on Nelson Mandela is rescheduled to run on Friday, Feb. 23.

After 27 years of imprisonment, Mandela was released from Victor Verster Prison last Sunday, Feb. 11. He has been a symbol of hope to many South Africans and a threat to others.

Will Mandela's release affect apartheid? Where do you think interracial relations will go? What role should the United States play?

For more information, come down to the Collegian offices and ask for Minu, Gayle, Reggie or Josh.

Send all submissions to the Editorial Desk, 113 Campus Center, c/o Minu Sebastian.

Bubble-headed Bush out of touch with reality

And we all thought that Ronald Reagan was a detached president. Well, the Gipper might have been inattentive but George Bush is positively lost in space.

As the world celebrates the relaxation of East-West tensions, the crumbling of the Warsaw Pact, and initiatives toward democracy in Moscow, where is our very popular president?

Why, he's doing photo-ops in B-1 bombers, visiting chemical weapons facilities and campaigning for an INCREASE in Star Wars spending.

Apparently, Mr. Bush can't find a better place to spend our money. He claims that events in Europe should not "lull the United States into a sense of complacency."

Translation: "Just because the chance of a superpower conflict has never been more remote doesn't mean my rich buddies in the military-industrial complex have to take a pay cut."

You see, Mr. Bush is not a leader.

Never has been, never will be.

He is a pure politician who is more concerned with re-election in 1992 than diverting resources to the domestic problems facing this country. After all, it's fun to watch those sissy Democrats whine about social spending.

One might have thought that after beating up on Panama, the President would have felt manly enough to risk a change in his budgetary mindset. Yet even with a huge popularity cushion, he is afraid to do the right thing. The pathologically insecure Mr. Bush insists on the need for TWO manned bombers and TWO long-range mobile missile systems.

Michael Greenfeig

"Wait a second," the UMass Republicans will cry. "Look at all those military base closings the President has proposed."

Yes, a very clever political move. Look closely and you'll see that most of those bases happen to be in areas where people vote for Democratic congresspeople. They will surely blame their representatives for the loss of jobs and not kind-hearted George.

As for the legitimate threats facing this country, they can be found within our own borders. I'd feel safer walking through a park in Leningrad than one in Boston or New York.

The American public school system is a bad joke, our infant mortality rate is a disgrace, race relations are worsening and our most dangerous toxic waste sites remain untouched. Yet the education/environment/children's president is pressing for a 1.3 percent increase in the Pentagon's budget.

Mr. Bush will argue that the answer to our social ills is not to spend more money. Why was it then that, when he and Mr. Reagan decided that the military needed fixing, the answer was a huge budget increase?

Perhaps the most telling moment came as Mr. Bush gave a speech that had interrupted a mock U.S.-Soviet war game at Fort Irwin in California. As he concluded, the President quipped, "and now back to war."

Maybe the problem is as simple as that. The Cold War may be over but George Bush sure is going to miss it.

Michael Greenfeig is a UMass student.

ARTS & LIVING

High class without the stuffed shirts

By SEAN T. O'CONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

Canadian Brass
Fine Arts Center
Tuesday, Feb. 14

What comes to mind when you think of Canada? Hockey? Bob and Doug MacKenzie? Mounties? Hockey again?

Add the Canadian Brass to the list. At the very sound of the name "Canadian Brass" one might think of some upper crust, stuffy classical music ensemble from up North. But from the very first sight of these brass-toting fellows entering the stage by way of the audience, attired in black tuxedos and wearing highly unorthodox white shoes, playing Dixieland style, you soon realize that you're in for something pleasantly different.

What makes the Brass so exciting and so unique is the rapport that they create with their audience. Their light-hearted demeanor and approach to their performance, complete with light splashes of humor interspersed throughout the program, act to create an appealing chemistry which helps to make the music more accessible to the audience.

Playing to a full house, Wednesday night's performance began with a flawless version of Vivaldi's "Sonata for Two Trumpets." Continuing with Gabrieli's "Canzone No. 2," the Brass literally brought the music to the audience, as tuba player Charles Daellenbach placed himself in the center of a row, borrowing a seat from an unsuspecting audience member.

The program continued with what is considered to be Bach's most famous work, "Toccata and Fugue in D Minor." Highlighted by the answering of Frederick Mills and Ronald Romm's trumpets to one another with incredible speed, clarity and dexterity, the Brass masterfully executed a very complex and technically demanding piece.

Switching gears the Brass performed jazzman Jelly Roll Morton's "King Porter Stomp" followed by the composition from the movie Rosemarie with comic relief provided by Daellenbach's tuba antics.

The Brass kept things rolling with selections by George Gershwin, one of the greats of American music. This was followed by the sad and moving "Adagio," familiar to many as the orchestration in the movie Platoon.

In the comic highlight for the show, the Brass performed Pieter Schtckele's "Hornsmoke: A Horse Opera in one Act," an American opera written for the Brass, in which they play the roles of cowboy, priest and hornslinging villian "B Flat Bart." Romm played the much sought after and bearded-but-lovely lady.

The program concluded with Henderson's arrangement, "Selection from Hasin Stree," a wailing blues jam which ended with a great round of applause, bringing the Brass out once more to perform an extravaganza of tuba playing for their encore.

Putting one over On-U

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Adrian Sherwood: the name may be vaguely familiar to many of you, but probably the large majority has no idea who this man is, and yet he's responsible for hundreds of records. He is the brain behind On-U Sound, the record label which encompasses Tackhead, Dub Syndicate, Mark Stewart and Maffia, African Head Charge, and Fats Comet, to name a just few. He has also produced or re-mixed countless other groups. One of his more famous "outside jobs" was producing Ministry's classic album Twitch.

DISC JUNKIE

With a core of diehard professionals at his disposal, Sherwood creates new bands with reckless abandon, usually the same few musicians, but each band name serving as the umbrella for a group of tunes related in some way. An example is the Barmy Army, who have just released a new record called The English Disease. It features bassist Doug Wimbish and guitarist Skip Mcdonald, who play on most of the funkier On-U releases, but the Barmy Army songs are all designed to show off some aspect of the British football scene (that's soccer to you Yanks who didn't know).

Another recent On-U release if from Gary Clail's On-U Sound System. Entitled The End of the Century Party, it takes tracks from various On-U artists and feeds them into the mixing blender, often adding entirely new lyrics, sung or rapped by Clail. In fact, some of the tracks from the Barmy Army album appear here as well. For example, one track, "Stadium Rock," turns up here as the backing for a bizarre fantasy song called "Privatise the Air," which presents a bleak outlook on a future society where the air is owned by huge corporations. Narrated by Andy Fairly, whose gruff tones are often pressed into service for cyberpunk stories over avant-funk melodies, it's a particularly effective piece of recycling.

One important difference between the Clail and Barmy Army albums is that the Clail album features several dub reggae tracks that may not appeal to those looking for more of the Tackhead funk sound. Personally, we find that sometimes we just can't stand the reggae tunes and have to skip them. Clail is also singing bit more, but it's not something he's really cut out for. Perhaps he should stick more to the ranting/rapping style that made 1987's Tackhead Sound System album so compelling.

Both of these albums have made it over to the States in limited quantities, due to the relative smallness of the On-U label. It is definitely worth your while in their compact disc incarnations, and "Rave On," one of the bonus tracks on the Clail disc, is a must.

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

My Left Foot
Academy of Music

"With speech therapy I can teach you to say fuck off more clearly," Christy Brown's doctor tells him, eliciting a rare giggle out of the acclaimed Irish painter and writer in one of the many touching scenes of the film, My Left Foot.

The film, based on Brown's autobiographical book of the same name, is so titled because of the artist's struggle to gain control over his motor skills, which were severely limited by his cerebral palsy.

Moore's artistic expression began the day he grasped a piece of chalk between his toes and made his first mark. He wrote the word MOTHER on the floor as related in yet another of the film's most beautifully structured scenes.

When he finally manages to do this it is a breakthrough, not just for the character of Brown (flawlewssly played by child actor Hugh O'Conner), but for the audience and the world as a whole.

Immediately after this Brown's father picks up his son, carries him off to the pub and proclaims "This is my son, Christy Brown — genius."

From there we see Daniel Day Lewis take over the role of Brown as a 19-year-old man, still struggling at self expression. The acting here is truly remarkable: Day-Lewis captures all of the rage and passion of a person confined, while never losing any of the believability of his situation. He acts his heart out, but never moves a muscle, except spasmodically.

This is a story about a man who at first was considered incapable of expressing anything, much less of having anything to say. The film takes us from Brown's childhood through to his emergence as an established artist. It's a journey that is beset by hardships and misunderstandings but is a story that is ultimately optimistic and inspiring, avoiding the trappings of sentimentality.

All of the performances are flawlessly authentic and the camera work is solid and non-intrusive, allowing the story to unfold at a natural pace.

And when Brown tells his doctor that Hamlet was a "cripple, he couldn't act," we see his point. Brown was no cripple, and the film carries this message beautifully.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Do not let pride keep you from reversing yourself on occasion. Children provide vital clues. Someone you thought you could trust may reveal a less reliable side. Avoid taking unnecessary chances.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): The joke may be on you today. Smile and refuse to get upset. Stick to the facts when making an important decision. Be patient with an older person who is ill or lonely.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Find out what is motivating someone before you champion his cause. The financial picture brightens. Go ahead and make bold moves. Legal efforts are favored. Leave room for the new and original.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Study all the information available before making a tough decision. Good timing is the secret to success in business and romance. Domestic life will hum along if you are both loving and diplomatic.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): A good day to negotiate with clients and publishers. Start a new work project or study program. Choose your words with care when talking to an older person. Spend the evening with friends.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Your enthusiasm makes you rush off in all directions. You will get better results if you slow down and tackle one thing at a time. Reserve time and energy for family members who need help.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Work to build a child's confidence. Your efforts will be richly rewarded. Financial pressures fade once you accept the obvious. Keep an eye on an ambitious member of the opposite sex.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Your plans could change abruptly. Wait until midday before making a definite commitment. A second choice will prove better than the first. Bring a joint financial venture to a halt. Build savings.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Plunge into your work today so you will not have to worry about it over the weekend. Settle a difference of opinion with romantic partner before your relationship suffers permanent damage.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Take advantage of a trusted associate's offer to help out in an emergency. You need to examine joint financial holdings before signing a contract. Stand your ground if a sibling tries to meddle.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Finish up your regular work before turning your attention to a pet project. Some unexpected news about a partnership leaves you lighthearted. An older person offers excellent advice; follow it.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Someone exits your life. Pull yourself together and move ahead. The mail brings welcome financial news. You may be able to take that dream vacation.

Alfie Mitchell said. "The last time we beat them was in '85 and if we're going to win, we can't make mistakes."

Mitchell's hopes of victory rest on the performance of his starting five all-arounders. Sick last week, Erika Baxter will be competing again as an all-arounder this weekend. Also in the rotation will be Lisa-Beth Cronen on the bars and Lynne Morris on the floor.

"We're really psyched for this meet," assistant coach Letitia Selk said. "Our all-arounders haven't hit their potential yet this season and they're getting hungry."

The Minutwewomen know they need to score in the 180's to have a chance against the Wildcats. Since UNH has been competing against tough opponents, Mitchell feels that will help the Minutewomen. Concentrating mostly on the Wildcats, Mitchell doesn't think the Owls of So. Conn. will be a factor in the meet.

"This meet should be between UMass and UNH," Mitchell said. "Southern Connecticut hasn't been scoring that well."

Mitchell and Selk have been making some minor changes in the Minutewomen's routines in order to remain more consistent.

"We've taken out parts of the routines where there's a high percentage of falling," Mitchell said. "With the higher hitting percentage in the routines, our confidence will go up and that could help win the meet for us."

Looking ahead down the schedule, Mitchell knows the Minutewomen must perform well to keep their confidence up for the Northeastwern meet on Wednesday. Northeastern scored a 183 in their last meet which might bring their ranking up to fifth in the Northeast, close behind the Minutewomen.

"Things are so tight at this point," Mitchell said. "Our next few meets are against top teams in the Northeast."

After the results of these upcoming meets, the Minutewomen will know what to expect if they reach the regionals because they mostly will meet UNH and Northeastern again.

meets. As far as back-up is concerned neither team has very many fourth and fifth place people to add support.

For the first time in years the Minutemen boast premiere performers in almost every event.

With the always strong middle and distance events being taken care of by such flyers as Steve Brown, Garfield Vaughn, James Chute, Joe Livorsi, Gerry Squires, Art Smith, and Joe Millette, any points coming from the speed or field events is no longer considered just icing.

Consistently finishing in the top four in the long jump has been Jerome Bledsoe. Bledsoe has cleared 22 feet on more than one occasion this season.

Kevin Walters is considered one of the best sprinters in New England, as he has captured 60 and 200 meter victories at a handful of races already.

With Joe Edgerton developing into a regionally-respected shot put man, an event that has always been weak for UMass, coupled with Walters and Bledsoe, the Minutemen have newfound points that could put them among New England's best.

in the nation. Their overall high score for the season is 265.55, a mark the Minutemen have yet to hit this season.

Temple sophomore Bill Roth has broken the school record for all-around score with a 57.3, while setting several other school and personal records this season. Seniors Mike Dellapena and Joe Rowlette captain the Owls.

"Outscoring Temple or breaking into the high 260's would be great for the team," Johnson said.

Although the Minutemen scored 261 points in beating Southern Connecticut and had some high individual scores, Johnson sees room for his team to improve.

"I felt good about the meet — but we've got a ways to go," Johnson said. "We did well against a team that was hard to get psyched up for.

"Even so, we had nine major breaks in our routines — if we take those away, we can add 4.5 points to our score," continued Johnson.

Freshman Steve Christensen scored a 9.3 on pommel horse, while sophomore Cal Booker managed a 9.55 for his floor routine.

"I think Steve Christensen is a very consistent performer — he can continue to clean up and contribute even more to the team in the future," Johnson said.

"He [Booker] had four routines with major breaks," Johnson said. "As far as keeping up his performance — he can even do better."

After spending the first month of the season at home, a change of venue might do the Minutemen some good.

"We're looking forward to getting out on the road," Christensen said. "We'll be going against better teams, with more competition, and the crowds are usually bigger on the road."

"To win [Sunday], I think we just have to hit our routines," continued Christensen. "If we do well against Temple, we'll keep getting better and building up our confidence."

UMass would be happy to for a repeat performance of last year's meet with Temple. The Minutemen trailed by 219-217, before outscoring the Owls 45-42 on the high bar to prevail by less than a full point.

"Temple and Syracuse will be our two toughest meets, but Army and Springfield won't be easy meets either," Johnson said. "The next four meets will be very exciting."

Temple and Southern Connecticut are both called the Owls, but that's about all they've got in common this season. The Minutemen have to keep that in mind for Sunday's meet.

"It's important for the guys to be excited about the meet and the competition, but at the same time they have to still focus on their skills and routines," Johnson said.

Skiers at Charlemont

By RICK D'ELIA
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts ski teams return to Berkshire East in Charlemont this weekend, where Amherst College will host the final two giant slalom races of the season.

Last weekend, UMass participated in the Brown Tournament at Loon Mountain, N.H. The rain came down all day Saturday for the slalom race. Even so, the UMass teams had some strong results despite the inclement weather.

The men's team finished third behind Plymouth State and Boston College. John Roche was once again the team's backbone with a third place finish. Sophomores Rob Umstead (13th), Chuck Holcomb (15th), Pete Sulkowitz (16th) and Josh Cohen (22nd) all put together two solid runs to score for the Minutemen.

The women skied their way into a fourth place spot. Marti Gilbert was once again consistent with a 10th place performance. She was followed by Jen Egan (13th), Mary Sinton (18th) and Debbie Adams (20th).

As the temperature plummeted, Saturday's rain turned into a hill of bullet-proof ice for Sunday's giant slalom. Likewise, it was an arduous task just to make it through the two-course run.

Roche proved that he can also be a strong force in the giant slalom by claiming a third place berth. Holcomb (11th) was the next Minuteman, while places 24-29 were filled by Mike Hannigan, Sulkowitz, Cohen, Mike Belanger, Matt Griffin and Paul Robinson, respectively. Although the depth was great, the men wound up in third place.

The women were also the third-fastest team in their division with solid results by Sinton (seventh), Marci Blacker (eighth), Egan (ninth) and Gilbert (16th).

Minutewomen, head coach Julie LaFreniere is comfortable yet eager for the competition.

"We're aiming to get people qualified," she said. "By running in races they've already qualified, the women will be helping out their teammates who need them to [competitively] be there in order to push them to qualify."

Most women on the team have already qualified for NEs, some have even qualified for ECACs. A distance medley relay will be one of many ECAC qualifying events. The relay consists of a 1200-meter, 400-meter, 800-meter, and 1600-meter, which are to be run by Becky Johnson, LeeAnn Ambrose, Julie Muccini, and Shana Smith.

Looking to qualify for NEs include: Dana Smith (400-meter), Lennice Johnson (600-yard, who missed by three-tenths of a second last meet), Sue McFayden (55-meter), Kathy Holt (5000 meter) and Laura LaVallee (3000-meter).

"Springfield will be good competition for us in the 3000-meter and 5000-meter," said LaFreniere. "They'll push us to do our best."

Close to half of the running team will race the 4x200-meter,

"a push us to find out who our fastest runners are," said LaFreniere. "It'll help us in leg turnover."

St. Joe's is the only A-10 team the Minutemen have yet to play, after having met the Hawks three times last year. St. Joe's won two, including a first-round A-10 tourney game.

The Hawks are sitting at 4-10 in the conference and 6-16 overall, and are coming off last night's 83-65 win at home against St. Bonaventure.

They have been playing much better of late for coach Jim Boyle, who announced his resignation earlier this year, effective at the end of the season. Sophomore Craig Amos is 10th in the A-10 in scoring, averaging 14.48 points per game, and ninth in rebounding at 6.38.

In UM's earlier tour of the city, the Minutemen lost to Temple, 86-69 on Jan. 20. UM and St. Joe's meet again on Feb. 28 at the Cage.

Eagles trying to get off ground

NEWTON (AP) — Night after night, Big East upsets happen. A powerhouse in that powerful league gets knocked off by a weaker member. Unless, of course, that member is Boston College.

Villanova surprised fourth-ranked Syracuse last Monday. Providence shocked third-ranked Georgetown last Tuesday. Don't bet on Boston College beting 10th-ranked Connecticut tomorrow.

The Eagles, one of the conference's strong teams in the early '80s, are indisputably the worst. Lacking a point guard and experience, they also lack victories.

They are 1-10 in Big East basketball games and virtually guaranteed a second straight last-place finish. In Jim O'Brien's four years as coach, they have the worst record in conference games, 13-46, even though he had Dana Barros, the conference's second leading career scorer, for the first three.

"Nobody dislikes losing any more than I do," O'Brien says. "It's very, very frustrating."

He took the job before the 1986 season and soon realized he was up against more than just the team in the other uniforms. His more pressing problems were on his own campus.

A cramped, 4,400-seat gym tucked into the drab, 28-year-old Roberts Center hardly impressed recruits.

A flap over reports that former star Jay Murphy stayed eligibile by enrolling in night school after flunking out made administrators wary of admitting academically questionable athletes.

And departing coach Gary Williams didn't leave O'Brien with an outstanding class of recruits.

"Jimmy didn't have too much talent [on the team] when he came in," said Bill Flynn, Boston College's athletic director since 1957.

All that is beginning to change.

The Eagles are in their second season at bright, 8,604-seat Conte Forum, which rivals other conference arenas, there appears to be increased flexibility in admissions standards for athletes, and O'Brien's recruiting is paying off.

"I don't think it's all gloom and mudville," Flynn said.

O'Brien, whose job appears safe, is starting three freshmen, one sophomore and one junior. One of the nation's top high school players — 6-foot-10 Bill Curley of Duxbury — and point guard Malcomb Huckaby of Bristol, Conn., have agreed to go to Boston College next season and could play prominent roles.

Minutewomen fall to PSU

Women's hoop hangs tough before Lions pull away, 73-54

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

OK, so the final score read Penn State 73, UMass 54. This game was by no means an easy 19-point win for the Lady Lions.

The Minutewomen gave an all-out guts effort in front of a less than capacity crowd in the Curry Hicks Cage last night.

"Our kids don't die, they don't give up, they really felt like they had a shot against Penn State," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. In fact UMass had Penn State scared. With nine minutes left in the first half, the Minutewomen led the Lady Lions 13-11, but then Penn State went to work. Lynn Dougherty hit five straight bombs from the outside to give Penn State a 21-17 lead that they never surrendered.

Patty Robak and the Minutewomen dropped a 73-54 decision to Penn State last night at the Cage.

The State full-court trap defense confused the Minutewomen and forced two straight turnovers which led to four points for the women from Pennsylvania. To their credit, UMass refused to quit and matched Penn State's intensity. Michele Pytko (12 points) posted up in the paint where she effectively scored four straight points to bring the home team within five, 30-25.

The fact that the score was a low 34-27 lead for State, showed just how physical this game really was. The defense was intense, elbows flew consistently, and no lay-ups were allowed. The atmosphere of this game was that of a playoff game.

The second half started out with UMass turning the ball over two straight times and Penn State scoring two easy bunnies to put this game for all intents and purpose out of reach.

Although trailing by double digits throughout the half, UMass never quit. Keyburn McCusker (17 points) and Helen Freeman (11) continued to score from the inside. The problem was that Penn State forward, Susan Robinson was dominating the paint on offense. Robinson scored 22 points, and picked the glass for eight bounds.

With any help at all from officials Joe Cronin and/or Dick Filippetti, UMass would have been within single digits at the end of the game.

"It's a very physical basketball game period, and it's a difficult on to keep under control," Hewelt said. Penn State employed a full-court trap defense, one in which they were able to physically abuse the Minutewomen without having to worry about being called for fouls. The defense forced numerous turnovers, which in turn Penn State turned into points.

Swimmers at NEs

Hope for second place

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The New England Championships are swimming's version of March Madness. Early March Madness; in fact, it's in February.

This weekend the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team takes its 8-4 record on the road to Kingston, R.I. to try and accomplish what they failed to do last season: finish second. The championships start today at the University of Rhode Island and run through Sunday.

Last season, the Minutewomen placed third behind champion Boston College and the University of New Hampshire in what was the most exciting race of the season. But that was last year. This year the Minutewomen look to avenge their disappointing third-place finish.

Led by coach Bob Newcomb, the Minutewomen are finally cured of almost all sickness which had plagued the team for some time, including the final two meets against UNH, which defeated UMass, and against Mount Holyoke, which UMass destroyed.

If it seems like deja vu, that's because of the identical record that UMass had last year and what they have this year. If it seems like deja vu to UMass, then Boston College surely feels the same.

The Eagles come into the championships as the decided favorites once again, and barring a miracle, they will stand upon the victors' platform in what has become an all-too-familiar sight.

"The New England Championships are always fun," Newcomb said. "We go in looking for second place, and this year I think we have a good shot at it."

This is the race that the Minutewomen have been training for all season, the time has come for the team to swim its fastest individual times of the season. Many will be motoring in search of what seems an elusive qualifying time for both the Eastern Championships and the Nationals.

For some, the season ends after Rhode Island, as it is definitely the last team event. Will UMass be denied the silver for the second straight season, or is it their year? The action should be fast and furious this weekend in Rhode Island.

Men's hoop drops another on the road

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

One of the keys to the success of the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team this season has been a stepped-up commitment to defense.

The Minutemen, who made more than a few teams look like Loyola-Marymount clones last season while yielding nearly 85 points per game, had cut that number significantly in 1989-90, down to a much more respectable 69.85 points per game (third in the Atlantic 10 Conference).

But funny things happen to this team when they step into the Charles E. Smith Center in Washington, D.C. Host George Washington University sees UMass walk in the door and then automatically throws it into overdrive.

Last night, the Minutemen tried to hang around but could never overcome the revved-up Colonials, who picked up a crucial 101-95 win. UMass dropped its third straight conference game and is 7-7 in the A-10, 12-11 overall.

GW meanwhile, is starting to get a mite close, now at 6-9 in the league and 12-13 overall.

UMass was hurt on offense by the absence of freshman forward Tony Barbee, who remained home while recovering from the flu. Sophomore Jim McCoy was also battling the bug, and struggled through much of the game despite finishing with 17 points.

Making up the difference was sophomore forward William Herndon, who had the game of his life with 35 points. But even that wasn't enough to stop the Colonials.

UMass led at various points in the first half, but GW rallied to take a 47-43 lead at the break. A pair of quick hoops got the Minutemen even to start the second half, but then GW went on a killer run that put UMass into a perpetual hole.

The Colonials opened it up to 59-51 and then Byron Hopkins was fouled going to the hoop. UMass coach John Calipari, by now a Smith Center favorite after his near-strip tease act in last year's loss there, lit into the officials and picked up a technical.

GW missed three of the four free throws and UMass cut it to four at 64-60. But the lead fluctuated, growing to as much as 15 on a pair of Matt Nordmann free throws that made it 82-67 with six minutes to play.

The game Minutemen rallied and sliced it to three on a Harper Williams three-pointer with 17 seconds left.

But UMass had long been forced to foul, and the Colonials made the clutch freebies down the stretch. In fact, GW shot 26-for-40 from the free throw line in the second half, alone, a serious thorn in the sides of the Minutemen.

Hoop du jour: The Minutemen return to the Brotherly Love Place for the second time this season, to tap off with St. Joseph's University tomorrow at 1 p.m. at Alumni Fieldhouse.

UM sports teams in action this weekend

The University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team members will have one last chance to upgrade their performances at Dartmouth College this Saturday before they compete in the prestigious New England Championships next weekend.

Colgate and New Hampshire, whom the Minutemen barely edged out for third place at Easterns last weekend, will also be present. With only three other teams present in Hanover, N.H., UMass will be engaged in a much more personal battle with UNH compared to the 15-team field at Easterns.

The two teams are similar in that they both have around 12 top-notch athletes capable of finishing in the top three of most

The final non-scoring meet for the University of Massachusetts women's track team will be Smith College's "last chance" invitational, tomorrow at noon in Northampton.

The event is called so because for all competitors involved this meet is their last chance to qualify for New Englands and ECACs.

Among the teams competing along with UMass will be Amherst College, Columbia University, Mount Holyoke College, Rochester University, Smith, Springfield College, Tufts University, and Williams College.

After building themselves a reputation as the road warriors, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team hopes to continue their winning ways at home, taking on their Northeast rival University of New Hampshire and Division II Southern Connecticut State University at Boyden Gym tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Certainly one of the biggest meets of the season for the Minutewomen (ranked fourth in the Northeast, 5-2 overall) there is no room for error if UMass wants a 'W' against the Wildcats of UNH.

"UNH always wants a win, but we have a much better team than last year's with Kristin [Turmail] back," UMass coach

If the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team is to enjoy a successful conclusion to its season, it will have to disprove the old saying that there's no place like home. The Minutemen will take their 5-3 record on the road for four meets, starting with Sunday's date at Temple.

"I think we can outscore Temple," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "We'll have to have our best meet, and Temple will have to score a little below their normal level.

"That's the great thing about athletics though; things like that can happen," Johnson continued.

Temple, with a 3-2 record, is ranked 15th

GEO statement blasts UM administration

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization issued a press statement last night blasting the University of Massachusetts administration's rejection of the GEO's offer to return to the negotiating table after breaking off talks last Wednesday.

According to Mark Kenen, GEO coordinating committee member, the organization tried on Friday to make an appointment to meet with Chancellor Duffey to renew negotiations.

Kenen said Duffey refused to meet with the group because he said he would be in Boston all week. However, Duffey was in Amherst last night to attend a memorial service for Kenya's Foreign Minister Robert Ouko but could not be reached for comment.

When the GEO offered to meet with Duffey in Boston he refused again, Kenen said.

He said the statement also blasted Provost O'Brien's comment Friday about the GEO's alliance with District 65/United Auto Workers: "We will appeal to the students not to strike and to perform their duties. But I can't imagine that TAs would go to such an extreme to join up with auto workers."

"The GEO/District 65/United Auto Workers is outraged at the behavior of the University administration," Kenen said. "Last Friday's comment by Provost O'Brien denigrating UAW was totally inappropriate coming from an administrator of a public university."

Duffey's refusal to meet with the organization, "is leaving us no choice but to pursue our March 1 one-day job action," Kenen said.

"We call on the University administration to stop efforts that force us into confrontation," he said. "We hope we can continue a productive and respectful dialogue with them."

The GEO has sought union recognition, curriculum fee waivers and no decrease in the total amount of graduate student employees from last fall to this spring.

The administration, citing legal rulings, has refused to recognize the GEO, an affiliate of the UAW, as the collective bargaining agent for graduate students.

Last night, the GEO released a tally of its membership and reported 1,327 members out of 2,329 total graduate students. This represents 57 percent of graduate students.

The University's News Office has estimated that there are 2,500 graduate students enrolled at UMass.

Vigil mourns foreign minister

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Members of the African Students Association at the University of Massachusetts and Chancellor Duffey gathered in the Campus Center last night for an impromptu ceremony to mourn the death of Kenya's Foreign Minister.

About 25 students, most originally from Africa, held black candles and wore black ribbons to mourn the death of the Minister, Robert Ouko, whose partly burned body was discovered Feb. 16 in a cane field near his home, three days after he disappeared.

The Government indicated that the 58-year-old minister is a slaying victim.

"We decided to come together to hold a small vigil to say that we're aware of what happened and we're horrified," said Nwando Achebe, president of the 40-member association and a junior at the University.

"We believe this is an act of violence and we're very, very horrified," said Achebe, who is from Nigeria. The hour-long service ended with hymms and a march inside the campus center.

Video focuses on American Indian struggle for education

UMass grad students produce video advocating for bilingual education for American Indians

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Imagine being forcefully taken from your family, bused to a school over 300 miles away, placed in a classroom with kids that all speak different languages and taught a language completely foreign to you while told to forget your own.

For Ii Ki Ba Do Dish, an American Indian who belongs to the Hidatsa and Mandan nations, this situation was only the beginning of the cruelty inflicted upon him by the Bureau of Indian Affairs in 1963.

Ii Ki Ba Do Dish, currently a University of Massachusetts graduate student in multi-cultural education, said he was forced to cut his long hair and was often beaten for not speaking English.

"Before I was sent to boarding school, I could speak three languages, none of them English," he said. "When I left there, I was barely able to speak one language other than English."

"I had to relearn my languages," he said. "I had also only learned English orally, I couldn't read it."

Because Ii Ki Ba Do Dish said he is "concerned about the subtle, cultural genocide" of the American Indians by European Americans, he and Robert Bearce, a UMass graduate student who teaches English as a second language put together a video promoting bilingual education for American Indians.

The video will be aired on local cable tonight at 6 p.m., and shown on the Union Video Council monitors in the Student Union until March 15.

While stressing the need for teaching American Indian languages and customs in the classroom the video also clears up many misconceptions concerning the first inhabitants of the Americas.

According to the video, American Indians had a written language long before European Americans settled here, although anthropologists dispute this.

The video claims that languages were written on wampum belts, although anthropologists say the belts of beads were only used as money. However, the makers of the video found paintings that showed members of the Iroquois nation reading wampum belts. Ii Ki Ba Do Dish and Bearce also discovered that it was the job of one person to guard the belts with his life because the belts told the history of the nation.

The Iroquois written language code, different from their

UMass trades with Soviets

UM-Leningrad Polytech exchange challenges preconceptions

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will maintain a balance of trade with the Soviet Union for the third consecutive year.

According to Lynn Hindley, study abroad coordinator for the International Programs Office, UMass has exchanged students on a one-for-one basis with Leningrad Polytechnic Institute since 1988.

Fifteen LPI students arrived to campus Feb. 5 and are scheduled to spend three weeks socializing and studying with the Amherst community. This summer, an equal number of UMass students will be guests in Leningrad.

Laszlo Tikos, slavic studies professor and faculty adviser to the exchange program, said LPI is a top-notch engineering college, the Soviet equivalent to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Tikos said that on previous trips to Leningrad, UMass students were popular with Soviet citizens.

"Once they found out [the students] were American, everyone wanted to practice their English on them or invite them places," he said.

Dmitry Butosov, a semiconductor physics graduate student at LPI, said not being fluent in English is no barrier to American - Soviet friendships.

"Even without language, we can understand each other," he said.

George Abdushelishvili, an economics graduate student at LPI, said the Americans he has met so far have been polite and respectful. The exchange program has challenged his negative preconceptions about Americans, he said.

"We used to think Americans only cared about business positions, careers and money," Abdushelishvili said. "Now we have learned {Americans] have another side to them."

He said he was not too impressed, however, with UMass parties.

"I don't understand some kinds of [parties] when the apartment is overcrowded," Abdushelishvili said.

"There is lots of beer and nothing else," he said. "I don't understand why these people gather."

Abdushelishvili said he prefers a small party with close friends with lots of conversation and food.

LPI students said the availability of food in the United States was astounding. The students said in the Soviet Union ration coupons are required for everything they buy.

Butosov said the abundance of fresh food at a Stop and Shop supermarket surprised him. Even more shocking he said, was that there were few shoppers in the store.

Exchange students said socializing between Soviet and American students has produced intellectual benefits. They said they have reevaluated their political perspectives.

UMass senior Jennifer Catlin and UMass graduate Charles Auclair II, who both spent last semester in Leningrad, said their experiences allowed them to learn about Soviet citizens from a source other than television.

"The way the news talks, everything is changing quickly, tomorrow," Catlin said. "While we were there, we didn't feel that sense of urgency."

"During the Reagan years, all that stuff about 'the evil empire" was garbage," Auclair said. "[My visit] allowed me to make my own decisions regarding the Soviet people."

LBGA members attend conference

Lesbian and Gay Student Union Conference held this weekend

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

More than 30 members of the University of Massachusetts Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance attended the seventh annual North East Lesbian and Gay Student Union Conference this weekend at Boston University.

According to conference organizers, an estimated 600 college students from across the United States, Mexico and Canada attended, making the conference the largest ever held by the group.

Ann Limura, NELGSU co-chair, said the conference started as a way to increase understanding within the gay community and provide workshops that will help the gay student in everyday life.

"People don't always realize that gay students often have different needs and the classes don't exist at colleges that help gay students," Limura said. 'We look at the conference as a necessary supplement to the educational process."

The conference also looked at the issues of homophobia, organizing a community, AIDS and domestic partnership.

Felice Yeskel, director of the program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns at UMass conducted the workshops: The Challenge for Leadership and Agitating Change: Developing a Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Agenda.

> "The world shouldn't be divided into things only straight people are able to do. I think we are all able of achieveing our goals."
> –Jay Darnell

Other workshop facilitators included Rear Admiral Norman Johnson, Retired Dean of Students, Boston University; the Reverend Rose Mary Denman, author of "Let My People In" and two-time Emmy winner Ron Gould.

The conference started with an address by Svend J. Robinson, an openly gay member of Canada's Parliament who announced he was a homosexual on national television two years ago and was re-elected to Parliament later that year.

Robinson stressed the need for an openly gay community in order to bring about the changes needed in laws concerning homosexuality.

He added that homosexuals should be able to enjoy the same privileges as heterosexuals in all aspects of life, including government recognized partnerships and child custody.

Jay Darnell, conference chair, said he hopes students can take something valuable away from the conference that they can apply to their own campuses. He said speakers and workshops were designed with that idea in mind.

"I think what we hoped to accomplish most was to inspire students not to limit themselves because of their sexuality," he said. "The world shouldn't be divided into things only straight people are able to do. I think we are all able of achieving our goals."

Darnell said organizers were also careful to include the idea of diversity in conference activities that would accurately reflect the students in attendance.

"We realize that the definition of gay is not limited to white males and we had workshops that look at anti-semitism and homosexuality, racism, dilemmas facing gays and lesbians of color and special problems facing bisexuals," he said.

UMass tries public fax on concourse

By LYNN MORELLI
Collegian Correspondent

Technology grows, and we sort of have to grow with it, according to Bud Wilkes, assistant director for the Campus Center administration office. He said that is why the office initiated the idea of installing a facsimile machine at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center concourse.

Wilkes and Forrest Davies, manager of building services, arranged to borrow the machine from Nutmeg Communications on a trial basis for the rest of the semester.

In the agreement, Nutmeg Communications provides the campus community the facsimile machine in exchange for a percentage of the profits, which could range anywhere from 20 percent to 45 percent, Wilkes said.

The Campus Center's share of profits will go to a state trust fund and be reallocated to the University, he said.

The facsimile machine is like a telephone, only the message relayed from one machine to another is in the form of a hard copy. It is possible to to send a message across the country in minutes.

As with a long distance telephone call, the minutes cost money. The price of the first two minutes is $15 and each additional minute is $2. The facsimile machine does not accept cash, but takes major credit cards.

Davies said he expects many business people attending conferences at the University to use the machine. But he said he is unsure about the student market.

"It seems like the new kid on the block type of thing," he said.

However, before installing a facsimile machine at UMass, Davies talked with administrators at Bentley College in Waltham and found a public facsimile machine was successful there.

If the same success is experienced at UMass, Wilkes said there are plans to install additional machines on campus, possibly in the Student Union, the munchy stores and residential areas.

"If we need more, we'll put another one in," Wilkes said. But he said from his own observations, that so far he has only seen students standing around the newly installed machine, staring at it.

Prof.: Feminism less angry in '80s

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

Feminism of the 1980s is paradoxical to feminism of the 1960s, according to Mary Katzenstein, a professor of government and women's studies at Cornell University.

There is less anger in newsletters put out by the National Organization of Women and in street demonstrations such as the Nov. 12 mobilization for abortion rights than there was in the 1960s, according to Katzenstein.

"Today's feminist movement resembles the suffrage movement," she said. Adding the degree of the movement is less angry and emotional.

She said the reason the paradox exists is that although the movement is less angry there is an increase in the amount of women's studies courses and a general awareness of gender issues.

"There is an endurance in gender awareness, discourse and a continued vibrance of feminism," Katzenstein said.

Katzenstein's lecture yesterday at Amherst College titled:

"Organizing Inside Mainstream Institutions: the Feminist Movement in the 1980s" was sponsored by the department of political science and women's and gender studies at Amherst College.

Katzenstein lectured on feminism in the Catholic Church and the in armed forces, both topics of her soon to be published book.

She said both were unlikely sites for feminism because they are male dominated institutions, but it does exist there in a subtle way.

"New to the 80s is the mobilization of women in male dominated institutions," Katzenstein said.

The leading moderate feminist group, the Defense Advisory Committee of Women in the Services (Dacowitz), works to integrate women into careers of the armed forces that have previously been shut off to them, she said.

"They empower women on the lower part of the totem pole," she said.

Permitting women to become priests is a main issue concerning women in the Catholic Church, she said.

"The Catholic Church demands total severance with one's personal life, Katzenstein said. She added that the church dictates when women get married and how many children to have.

Ouko's son, Kenneth, is a chemical engineering student at UMass and a member of the student association. He is scheduled to graduate in May.

Ouko has visited the University twice in the past two years, spending weekend visits at the chancellor's house on campus. His most recent visit was last October when he met with Duffey and several UMass students from Kenya.

Chancellor Duffey and his wife, lobbyist Anne Wexler, were asked this afternoon by students to participate in the service.

Duffey met Ouko four years ago when his son became interested in UMass and has since visited the minister's home in Africa.

"He was someone who I admire a great deal, not only as a wonderful human being but also as someone who was thoroughly dedicated to government and to service," Duffey said. "He was a practical man, one of great energy and love and enthusiasm."

Duffey said Ouko and his family were scheduled to visit UMass in May for Kenneth's graduation.

"We are crushed by the news of his loss this week," he said. "It's particularly tragic to me that in a week we should have such good news as the release of Nelson Mandela that we should mourn the loss of Robert Ouko who had such a bright future."

Duffey said Kenneth left Friday for Africa and is scheduled to return to the University in three weeks. Duffey said he will extend an invitation to Ouko's wife and children to visit the University for Kenneth's graduation in May.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

When fiction becomes reality

Just when I thought that I could forget that people like Charles Stuart were not fictional, just when I thought I could push Carol Stuart's savage murder to the back of my mind — I watched a television movie that resurrected the same horror.

Meredith O'Brien

Last week I saw Blind Faith, based on the non-fiction book by Joe McGuinness. It was a two-part television movie about a husband who had his wife killed so he could pay off his debts, play with his lover and put away a tidy little sum for himself.

If I had seen this movie last year, even six months ago, it would have seemed completely fictional, impossible and ridiculous. Watching the character of John Marshall cynically lie, use and cheat his family, his wife and his friends out of happiness for his own sordid pleasure, would have resembled some wild plot from the daytime soaps.

But it wasn't fiction. It really happened.

The real John Marshall, who had his sleeping wife shot in the back twice while he stood a few feet away, is currently on death row in New Jersey. He is supposed to die by lethal injection. His case is still on appeal.

The problem with this movie was that it evoked the same sort of feelings that the Stuart case did — excluding the rage concerning the blatant Boston P.D. racism that erroneously pinned the blame on William Bennett. A husband who seemingly "loved" his wife, cold-bloodedly calculated her murder. (Whether or not Charles Stuart killed his wife with his own hand or had someone else do it is irrelevant.)

How can things like this happen? How can people be so ruthless? Has murdering one's wife or family member always been a common practice or has it suddenly surged with the selfish, narcissistic phase that our country seems caught up in?

Maybe I'm naive. Maybe I should stop thinking that there's some good in everyone. Maybe I should stop believing that people marry because they love one another. Maybe I should face reality . . .but I really don't want to.

To admit to myself that the Stuart and Marshall cases are not uncommon, to admit that people are oftentimes brutal, is very difficult. To see hatred, to see its violence, is overwhelming.

When I read the news or watch it on television, I sometimes have to remind myself that it's real.

Who would think that people could be so horrible as to hang a little boy upside-down in a closet, deprive him of food, scald and beat his tender little body to death? Who would think that people would parade down the streets claiming that White domination and White rule is the way life should be? Who would think that a student would be beaten up for picking up a pizza in a dormitory lobby, just because he was not White? Who would think a gay man would be beaten to death in the streets of Dorchester, simply for leading the type of life he wanted to lead?

I feel as though I've lost a lot of faith in humankind. Perhaps there is an inherent evil in this world that will always dominate our news and our lives. But there must be some good left somewhere — somewhere far, far away from the likes of Charles Stuarts and the John Marshalls.

Got any clue where?

Porn ban a necessary freedom

Danielle Dowling apparently does not even know just what she is talking about ("Banning porn no solution" Feb.13). This is hardly suprising, however, when one considers the slanted Collegian coverage of porn. It is a shame that the Collegian has been promoting so many lies about this issue, rather than taking a stand opposing violence against wimmin (sic).

What I voted for was not a pornography ban, but the removal of a ban. The University Store, you must understand, is not selling pro-womon (sic) or pro-sex literature, but is selling anti-womon (sic) propaganda that promotes sexual harassment and rape.

The University Store does not have its priorities straight, and on a campus where wimmin are subjected to sexual harassment everyday, the University Store does not have any legitimate excuse to sell hate-literature.

Porn is an attack on wimmin. It is trafficking in wimmin, and it sexualizes oppression against them.

Ms. Dowling is a fool not to see the link between porn and oppression. If most rapes did not mimic what the rapist learned through porn, I might believe her then. If men did not view wimmin as sexual objects, if men did not devour pornography like they do, then I might believe her.

The fact that porn is so popular, however, shows that oppression is being sexualized, and if oppression is sexualized for men, then for men oppression is sex.

Contrary to what Ms. Dowling suggests, rape is not just an act of power and control. What Ms. Dowling forgets is that men derive sexual pleasure from rape. Porn is one reason why.

Due to the lack of submissions, the forum on Mandela is rescheduled to run on Friday, Feb.23.

After 27 years of imprisonment, Nelson Mandela was released from Victor Verster Prison Sunday, Feb. 11. He has been a symbol of hope to many South Africans and a threat to others.

Will Mandela's release affect apartheid? Where do you think interracial relations will go? What role should the United States play?

Liberty in Middle East?

Freedom and liberty have whirled round the globe faster than any of us could imagine. From Panama to Poland, hundreds of thousands of people are now taking in their first breaths as free men, women and children.

David R. Mark

This is truly an amazing age, as the many peoples of Planet Earth have demonstrated in the past year.

Except in the Middle East.

With the exception of Israelis, who live in a democratic system, and Palestinians, who are fighting for their own democratic nation, individual freedoms and liberties are few and far between in the Middle East. While we, as freedom-loving Americans, rally behind the Romanias and Czechoslovakias of the world, we seem to have forgotten Saudi Arabia, Syria and Libya.

Why hasn't democracy come to the Middle East? According to Adnan Haydar, director of Near Eastern Area Studies at the University of Massachusetts, freedom may not come immediately to the Middle East, but the day will come.

"This is a tide, and I don't think the Middle East should be counted out of it. It's going to come to the Middle East as well," he said. "The people in the Middle East will take the cue from the Europeans and at some point they will rise and ask for rights."

In general, the constitutions of the Middle East countries allow for the same type of basic rights as we have in the United States or those found in Europe. But Haydar agrees that what appears in the constitutions of these countries is not always carried out.

The result is that some people have more freedoms than others. Haydar points to Jordan, which had parliamentary elections in 1989, as a sign of the future.

"For the first time in Jordan the people had a say in electing their representatives and choosing the kind of political party they believed would be best for their interests," he said, adding that even previously excluded conservative Islamic groups, like the Muslim Brotherhood, were included in the elections.

Nonetheless, other countries like Lebanon, which has been a mess since 1975, and Libya, which is run by a cult of personality, may take longer to change. The same may be said of Iran, Iraq, Syria and Saudi Arabia, all of which have few, if any, strong ties to western democracies.

What can Americans do? They can protest these countries as they have protested Eastern European countries in the past. With a semblance of leadership in Washington, we can let these nations' leaderships know that the day will come when they too will have to recognize their peoples' best interests.

"The day will come when the people of the Middle East will assert their rights," Haydar said.

I hope this day comes too.

MINI-EDITORIAL: Amid the worldwide cheering of the triumph of Nelson Mandela's release from a South African prison, it's good to see President Bush didn't go completely wacko and drop all sanctions against the racist nation.

Mandela's release is important, as is recognition of the African National Congress, but these should only be perceived as symbolic gestures. Bush recognized this and said the United States must see greater changes before the sanctions are lifted.

While Bush should do more to force the end of apartheid, his most recent actions should be applauded.

Democracy is the real issue

"We will appeal to the students not to strike and to perform their duties. . . But I can't imagine that TAs would go to such an extreme [action] to join up with auto workers." (Provost O'Brien in the Collegian, Feb.16)

Once again the Provost has shown his true colors. As a member of the Graduate Employees Organization/District 65/United Auto Worker's Negotiating Team, I was stunned to read this quote.

This classist and elitist statement of the Provost is totally inappropriate for a public university and is an insult to the entire UMass community.

By trying to make the UAW the issue, the Provost is attempting to steer public debate away from the basic issue: the University's refusal to allow graduate employees to democratically choose whether to have a union or not.

We do not expect, nor are we asking, the University to unilaterally recognize GEO/District 65/UAW as the collective bargaining agent of graduate employees. We have asked for a process where graduate employees may choose for themselves.

There are two possible ways for this process to work: a third party counting our union authorization cards or a free and democratic election. Either one of these options is totally acceptable to us.

In their letter to the University community last Thursday, the administration implied that they had offered us an election.

But in their proposed election they get veto power over who is on the ballot and refuse to agree to make binding agreements with the winner.

Marc Kenen

UMass graduate employees are asking for their basic human rights as workers: to be able to democratically elect their representatives, whether it be the GEO/District 65/UAW, another union or no union at all.

Democracy is the issue, not the United Auto Workers. After six long weeks of intense negotiations with the University, our negotiating team has hit a dead end on this issue. Under no circumstances will we allow the administration, or anyone else, to dictate who can and cannot represent us.

The University has repeatedly said that it does not have the legal authority to recognize a graduate employee collective bargaining agent. Only the Board of Regents has that power.

But what they don't say is that the Board of Regents has the power to delegate such authority to the campus administration. However, Chancellor Duffey refuses to even ask the Regents for such authority.

On Friday I talked to Duffey and asked him to meet with us this week. He refused. He said he was going to be in Boston all week. I told him that we would be willing to come to Boston to meet. He still refused.

It's a shame that Duffey finds it necessary to leave campus and have the Provost do his dirty work. And dirty work it is.

The Provost's quote was no accident. It was meant to be provocative and to breed division within our organization.

Obviously, the University administration feels that they can resist our calls for democracy. They have issued us an unspoken challenge to prove our ability to shut down the University.

So that's exactly what we're going to do on March 1.

Marc Kenen is a member of the GEO/District 65/UAW Negotiating Committee

The Iroquois written language code, different from their oral language, has yet to be deciphered.

The video also states that the United States got the idea of "government by the governed" from the American Indian democratic nations. It points out that ancient Greece, considered to have the first democracy, in fact had kings.

The video quotes Robert Kennedy speaking on the treatment of American Indians: "The first Americans have become the last Americans."

Ii Ki Ba Do Dish said that as European Americans settled, they learned: "The way to destroy the Indian people was to destroy the family base and the land base. That was the way to solve the 'Indian problem.'"

American Indians today suffer identity crises that often lead to drug and alcohol abuse, Ii Ki Ba Do Dish said. This stems from the current educational program, he said.

American Indian children never truly fit into the European American lifestyle, he said. When they return to their respective Indian nations, their families realize they have "unlearned" all their traditional customs and languages.

"Once you destroy a people's culture and identity, where do they fit in?" Ii Ki Ba Do Dish asked.

He noted the absurdity of forcing American Indians to celebrate American holidays such as Columbus Day. He said Columbus was responsible for the brutal murders of 250,000 Arawash Indians. Ii Ki Ba Do Dish said that if the Arawash did not give Columbus riches and gold, he had their hands chopped off and left them to die.

"If you want Indians to celebrate Columbus Day, you ought to have a holiday for Adolph Hitler," Ii Ki Ba Do Dish said.

In fact, according to Ii Ki Ba Do Dish, the Nazis studied how the Americans treated the American Indians and by and large modelled their concentration camps after them.

Today, American Indian nations have quasi-sovereign status, meaning they have their own governments and judicial process as well as the right to dictate their own official language. These nations have signed several treaties with the United States.

"These treaties guarantee certain things, such as [U.S. supported] education," he said. "We want the U.S. to live up to that."

Corrrection

On Feb. 12, the Collegian began a story with "The case involving four students' violations of the Student Code of Conduct..." The sentence should have read, "The case involving four students' alleged violations..." The four students named were Eric Nakajima, Ted Chambers, Robb Smith and Brian Crawford. The Collegian regrets the error.

ARTS & LIVING

They've got the beat

By LISA MILLEGAN

Beat Cafe
Hampden Theater
Thursday Feb.15

"Why didn't I discover this place sooner?" This question occurred to me over and over last Thursday night during an enjoyable evening I spent at the Beat Cafe. Oh I had seen the signs scattered around the campus several times last semester, but I had only quickly glanced over them, never realizing this gem of entertainment was to be found in my very own Southwest Residential Area.

From the moment I walked into the cafe, I was impressed with the atmosphere. The jet-black room was lit up with multi-colored candles placed at each table, and white lights adorned the blue back drop on the stage. The pleasant mood of the place combined with the complimentary refreshments at the door probably helped create the relaxed feeling of the crowd.

My interest grew when I realized the show was to begin with performance artist John Grillo. A UMass art professor, Grillo is well known for his work during the "Beat Era" of the 50s.

His light-hearted production entitled "America! America!" didn't disappoint me. Taking center stage, Grillo sat down on a stool and read short slice of life essays while five mimes acted the stories out behind him. One essay focused on a man's reactions to changes that happened on a familiar street.

My personal favorite was the story entitled "A Work of Art" — one in which a painting is hated by everyone who views it until an art critic writes up a favorable review. Grillo concluded the show with, "I Threw Candy at the Sky," after which he and the mimes threw candy at the audience.

The evening briefly declined with the next performer, poet Carl Sesar. A comedian, Sesar read his translations of ancient Roman poet, Valerius Catlullus. The problem was that the only thing funny or of interest about the poems was they contained a lot of "bad" words. The poems basically talked about the unusual sexual antics of the poet which was funny to a point, but became boring very quickly. Admittedly though, Sesar did coax a lot of laughs out of the audience.

Undeniably, the best performance of the evening, however, was given by the Fred Clayton Jazz Quartet. The band looked sharp and the playing was hot. Excellent solos by saxophonist Chuck Langford highlighted the group's first tune, "Blue Monk." The band's competence and energy noticeably drove the audience's spirits up.

Izzy Gesell concluded the evening with an adequate comedy routine. Giving his jokes a local flavor, Gesell constantly referred to humor specific to Amherst and Northampton.

The Beat Cafe has been cut down to only two performances a semester these days so those who missed the Thursday night show will have to wait until April to catch the show again.

According to Cafe publicist Tonya Rubino, the next cafe will feature student performers. If the recent Cafe is a good measure of future performers, the next one should definitely not be missed.

New stuff thrown out to Pearl St. by the Muses

By CYNTHIA CONRAD
Collegian Correspondent

Throwing Muses
Pearl Street
Friday, Feb. 16

"Most of these songs are new, so you paid money to see a Throwing Muses rehearsal," murmured singer Kristin Hersh shyly during the band's Friday show at Pearl Street.

In addition to live standards, "Red Shoes," and "Say Goodbye," Throwing Muses played only four previously unreleased songs.

The remainder of the short, one-hour set showcased new material for the appreciative crowd. The most notable of these, "Cottonmouth," "Honeychain," "Full Moon," "Empty Heart," "Him Dancing" and "Hook in Her Head," indicate that the next album will be perhaps their most mature yet.

Although a few of the songs were a bit bland with R.E.M.-type guitar and vocal harmonies, the majority of the material resolves the striking differences in style from one album to the next — a surprising midway point similar in style to their EP, Chains Changed. The songs have the internal consistency of the band's last album, Hunkpapa, but increased emphasis on hard, heavy guitar lends a fuller sound, creating depth of expression. David Narcizo's drumming is a much more defined, solid beat, providing rhythmic strength. It is also encouraging to hear Tanya Donelly's often overlooked vocal talent involved more frequently in lead vocals. Leslie Langston either abandoned the bass for the night, or for good, replaced by and energetic player introduced simply as "Fred."

Kristin Hersh of Throwing Muses

Although the laid-back, intimate show was much too short and disappointed those who expected to hear more familiar material, it was a great opportunity to foresee what the future has in store for Throwing Muses.

Robeson! uses song to tell the story

By ANTONIA MAGUIRE
Collegian Correspondent

Robeson!
Bowker Auditorium
Wednesday, Feb. 14

Don Oliver, performer of Wednesday night's "Robeson!" has a remarkable talent. He has a beautiful singing voice which was rewarded with two standing ovations. However, as an evening of entertainment as well as a documentary of the life of Paul Robeson, the audience may well have expected more.

In his one man-show, Oliver sang some twenty-eight songs lasting three three to four minutes each. The music was interjected with narration about the life of the actor and activist. The audience was, perhaps, expecting a play about the life of Paul Robeson, with musical entertainment holding it all together.

That said, however, the show was well received and greatly appreciated, even if it was somewhat thin on the narrative side.

The first half of the show covered the life of Paul Robeson up to the time when he left Rutgers and then Columbia University, and his entry into the performing arts. Oliver brought alive to the audience a sense of the abuse Robeson received as the only Black man at Rutgers University and the discrimination he was faced with as a potentially great lawyer.

Even with his first performance - Eugene O'Neill's "All Gods Chillun Got Wings"(1924) where he played a Black man of dignity opposite a White woman, he received mixed reviews. Oliver emphasized that unlike Ira Aldrich before him, Robeson refused to play for a segregated audience.

Oliver's incredibly stirring voice and charismatic style managed to get the audience singing to songs such as "Swing Low" and "Down By The Riverside" in the first half and to "O' No John" and "Jacob's Ladder" in the second - songs that were part of Robeson's own repetoire.

The second half of the performance concentrated on Robeson's work for the defense of the oppressed and his persecution by the House Unamerican Activities Committee, during the 1950s. Oliver sang some of Robeson's own songs such as "Peatbox Soldier," which was dedicated to the oppressed Jews in Nazi Germany. He also sang "Viva La Quenta Regatta," the song with which Robeson was able to halt the Spanish Civil War for a day, coaxing both sides to listen.

Oliver finished his performance with the emphasis upon Robeson as essentially a very proud Black man who would not be defeated by those who told him to take the politics out of his performing. When Robeson asked President Truman how come America put so much effort into the winning of World War II while Blacks were still being lynched in the South and Truman said that he should not confuse domestic and foreign matters, Robeson replied that the two were obviously one and the same.

Oliver left us with the knowledge that Robeson was blacklisted and had his passport taken away, and with the words 'All races, all religion... The right to speak my mind... But especially the people... is America to me.'

Don Oliver grew up with the sounds of gospel and spiritual music in his native Ohio. Since then he has studied formal voice, acting and movement in Harlem, and toured for the five years with the Black music ensemble Voices. He has also worked for several state art agencies and has taped a special solo series of television programs based on spirituals, gospel blues and jazz.

Some ranting and raving opportunities for the land

ART ATTACK

I've often wondered under what conditions people read this newspaper. Are you waiting for a bus or a class. Sitting in a class or on a bus? Eating, excreting, killing time, etc. et. al.? Is it ever a primary action? Are you ever really interested?

I wonder because I remember my own interest in the Collegian, before I had my own writings to look at, was virtually nonexistent. I would lazily glance at some headlines, paruse the Ed/Op page, take a quick stroll through a generally out of touch arts page, finishing up with a voracious feast of comics, horoscopes and the ever impeccably written menu.

And then one day I actually read an entire arts story, one that happened to do more than mildly annoy me. A truly awful writing style combined with opinions that revealed a complete lack of any artistic appreciation, caused me to gather my stringy bits of gut together and meekly saunter down to the imposing offices of the Collegian newsroom.

And since then I've had the honor of attempting to inform, entertain, annoy and/or bore a number of highly intelligent, physically attractive, differing yet wonderful personalities through these pages.

Which brings me to a point. Every so occasionally I read a column that suggests that the generally ever thoughtful writer had a deadline that his/her imagination could not meet. I've also noticed the tremendous amount of non-Collegian people who often have something of importance to say, but no room to say it as they lack either the time or patience to deal with what is kindly referred to as "office politics."

I therefore offer this column space, on a vaguely regular basis (dependent upon submissions and initiative) to the Five College community to do with as you wish. The only thing that might give the potential opinion giver cause for alarm is the fact that I will feel more than free to edit to kingdom come. Hate, love, questions, complaints, advice, pain, confusion and anything you want in print are welcome, as long as the matter is a series of words.

Send all commentary to the Collegian Arts Desk. Remembering Jeff Goldblums' character in the Big Chill: "The average [People] article should be no longer than the average crap."

Note — any resemblance, real or imagined, to the word "Bones" is entirely coincidental as it was that very scrawling that caused me to be here in the first, reactionary, place.

Editor's Note — This is a completely serious offer to submit criticisms/anything that can legitimately be printed in the Arts section of the Collegian. All submissions should be written in such a manner that they are legible to a person other than the original author.

Commencement Speaker

Proposals are requested for Student Commencement Speaker

Eligibility: Graduating UM senior.

Format: Not more than three typewritten pages, double spaced, or the equivalent of 3-5 minutes speaking time.

Subject Matter: Text should concern higher education, and be relevant to the University and the individual's experience here.

Selection Process: A committee of students (majority) nominated by SGA, "Collegian" designee, faculty, and staff designees, will review entries. (Authors' names will be deleted to ensure objectivity.) Ratings will be assigned. Selected authors will be asked to "audition" before the committee. Final selection will then be made by the committee.

Deadline: Thursday, February 22, 1990.

Submit proposals to: Robert N. Brooks, Director
Student Affairs Information Services,

Berryhill speaks out through song

Cindy Lee Berryhill: "I am not a feminist."

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Trying to explain music in words is sometimes as difficult as trying to describe the color green to a blind person. You just don't know what it is until you actually experience it.

Cindy Lee Berryhill, who opens for the duo of Kevin Kinney (of Drivin' and Cryin') and Peter Buck (of R.E.M.) tonight at the Iron Horse, is indescribable.

"I'm a totally anti-comparison person," she says. "I'm the only me there is."

True enough. But the world could certainly do with a few more of her. In her two albums, Who's Gonna Save the World? and Naked Movie Star, Berryhill tackles issues that are both personal and social.

The songs that have garnered her the most attention, "Damn, Wish I Was a Man" and "Baby, Should I Have the Baby?," both deal with feminist issues and have caused many people (who feel the need to label every musician) to label her a feminist.

"I am not a feminist," she corrects. "I am a woman and I speak from a woman's experience.

"Damn, Wish I Was a Man" discusses the double standards between the sexes of our society, while "Baby, Should I Have the Baby?" is the story of a woman debating on whether or not to have an abortion. It's a song that has gotten Berryhill in more than a little trouble. Trouble that she revels in.

"I got kicked off the last two shows of the Christy Moore tour in Europe because of "Baby, Should I Keep the Baby," she says. "Abortion is illegal in Ireland and Moore is Irish.

"But it was really cool. It was really a blast. The papers kept calling me up and asking, 'What's going on?'"

This unique performer, whose live show consists of a collage of ballads, rattling rockers and poetry from the likes of Dylan Thomas, has also opened for people such as reggae superstar Jimmy Cliff and England's greatest socialist folk singer Billy Bragg.

"I like working with people who have the spirit of speaking out for what they believe in," says the lover of Charles (Barfly) Bukowski stories.

After opening for Kinney and Buck on the East coast, she will headline some shows down South, where people will get a full dose of the unique persona that is Cindy Lee Berryhill.

A Phishing trip full of amoebas

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

Phish
SUB
Saturday, Feb. 17

By the end of the hour and a half that the band Phish played, I had reached a new plane of trippy existence.

My legs were sore from jumping up and down with the band as they jumped on a trampoline. The guitarist and bassist had invented a new Olympic sport — synchronized guitar and bass playing on a trampoline. They spun around never missing a note. The Grateful Dead stamp given at the door was indicative of Phish's music. The crowd of hairy people with long flowing dresses or tie-dyes resembled a Dead audience. Phish seemed to be having an identity crisis. Their songs were longer and spacier than usual. They did not play as many songs as usual. They even tried out a song from their new album, which resembled a Simon and Garfunkel love song.

Phish shows, like Dead shows, are a great place for running into people that you usually do not see. I ran into someone from my high school freshman year Math class. She was at Phish because she had gone out with the bassist's little brother. She was having a trip down memory lane.

If you are feeling lonely or unloved, Phish shows, featuring amoeba hugs, wipe away those insecurities. Amoeba hugs consist of lots of caring people you do or do not know hugging in a big circle. Afterwards, I felt a wonderful, peaceful feeling that I was really loved.

Tons of dancing led to tons of sweat. The throngs of people making boisterous noises was like life in the jungle. The lead guitarist's tangerine colored beard and hair in conjunction with the bizarre faces he made while playing resembled a gorilla on acid. The drummer was wearing a black jacket with huge pink polkadots. He looked like a crazed lady bug.

Overall, Phish was as phunky as ever. As long as they do not try to merge their identity with the Dead they will go places.

Solo acoustic guitarist Ari Vais ages gracefully on his new cassette

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Aging Well
Ari Vais
 1/2

Lou Reed is like a god to Ari Vais. On Vais' new acoustic tape, Aging Well (sold at Al-Bum's), Reed's influences are obvious. But when Vais takes Reed's style and pushes it one step further, the results can turn into minor, unpolished gems.

This is most apparent in "Mr. Lee," in which Vais sings/talks in a deadpan style. Just a touch of Caribbean rhythms at the end make this song something special.

The title cut, "Aging Well," is another stand-out. Leading off with a guitar solo reminiscent of David Bowie in his Ziggy Stardust days, the song is sung with all the cockiness and boastful pride of a high school boy. Crass references to sex and drugs, combined with a few arrogant laughs make the song mostly good fun.

Fun is something that the tape could use a bit more of. If Vais' characters in any way resemble his personal life, it's a wonder this boy hasn't committed suicide. Lost loves ("Hartford"), lost friends ("Death of a Fool") and psychopaths in general ("Kino Ki Papa Tai").

In "Kino Ki Papa Tai" (a Swahili phrase that refers to a woman with large certain parts of her anatomy), Vais has created a character so paranoid that it would make Ray Davies of the Kinks proud. With lines like "Please take off your shoes/So you don't get my heart all muddy," you know this man is more than a bit uncomfortable around this full-figured woman.

Vais throws some dark humor into "Silly Smirk," again demonstrating Reed's Velvet Underground influences as well as a touch of R.E.M. It's a rather cute tune about a girlfriend who beats on her guy.

Vais proves his versatility on "Boredom and Frustration II." With its psychedelic, Beatlesque style, it provides the album with the variety it needs.

Often, Vais' lyrics border on trite and his angst-filled songs become a bit obnoxious. "1980s," Vais' farewell to the preceding decade, is a bit preachy, but it still has more substance than Billy Joel's shallow laundry list, "We Didn't Start the Fire."

"Grandpa's Song" is his strongest lyrical effort. Paying homage to his old and decrepit grandfather, Vais paints a picture of an old man who remains bitter at his daughter for wanting to put him in "an old man's shack." Yet grandpa and grandson share a special bond, and in the old man's nearly sightless eyes and deaf ears, we see flashes of the great man that once was.

Unfortunately, only four tracks on Aging Well were recorded in a studio. The result is that most of the tape has a bit of a muddy sound. "Down in the Basement," recorded live in the Butterfield Coffeehouse, is barely up to bootleg quality.

But then again, Lou Reed and the Velvet Underground never recorded crisp and clear albums either.

Vai will perform Aging Well in its entirety as part of his March 1 performance at the Hatch.

UMass trailed by as much as 11, as a pair of free throws by Beth Gromlowicz (10 points) made it 57-46 with 5:40 to play. UMass was in the midst of a drought that saw them score just five points in a eight-minute span, more than enough slack for the Bonnies to rally from a 41-40 deficit to assume command.

But freshman Patty Robak nailed a foul line jumper, Freeman a baseline drive and Pytko a pull-up pop to narrow it to 57-52 with plenty of time, 4:33 to play.

Yet, the Bonnies milked the clock with some key offensive rebounding (Shay finished with 14, seven off each window), and Hergenroeder popped the balloon with a huge three-pointer to open it back to eight, 60-52 with 2:34 left.

Pytko scored six points in the final 1:03, but Hergenroeder and Gromlowicz responded with six free throws to ice the win.

It was a close game throughout the first half. UMass opened to an 8-3 lead before the Bonnies ran off eight straight. A three-pointer by senior Sue Serafini helped close it to 26-25, Bonnies at the half.

With UMass still in contention for eighth place and a home game to open the A-10 tourney, this game would have been a nice one to win. Instead, UMass has some work to do, with key games at Duquesne (Thursday) and Rhode Island (March 3) down the road.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): A damaged relationship can be repaired if you are willing to make intelligent compromises. Share your experiences with a younger person. Begin health and exercise self-improvement program.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): You take things very seriously. Postpone making major decisions and try to add a few fun-loving friends to your life. Handicrafts could be the perfect outlet for your creativity. Your family applauds.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Invest in a self-improvement tape or video. Others will be surprised by how much you can accomplish today. Use a little restraint when it comes to spending money, however. Save for a vacation.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Credit matters or joint finances could make this a trying day. Do everything that is asked of you without fuss or delay. Your cooperation will win the approval and backing of influential people.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): A generous attitude will help you enlist the suppport of prominent people. Shopping for household items holds great promise. Influential friends like your style. Romantic bonds are strengthened.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): Create a friendly climate at work. Group knowledge and resources can lead to the realization of a long-sought professional goal. Secure support of influential people. Romance is on your mind.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): A realistic attitude is vital. Think twice about a spectacular purchase or business move. Greater involvement in a community project or charity will be rewarding. Family wants to be included.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Refuse to settle for the status quo! Taking a new direction will add excitement and romance to your life. A family member could play on your sympathy. Continue to make your own decisions.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): A major decision must be made. A re-evaluation will be needed; seek experts; advice. Go with big opportunities; do not limit yourself. Socialize tonight. Have some laughs and a romance may develop.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Money arrives from several sources. Capitalize on one of your many talents. An older person is only too willing to advise you about your investments. Romance looks thrilling.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): A sense of restriction is gone. Many messages are sent. A change of lifestyle will boost your spirits. Be careful when investing in new clothes. You attract someone who previously has been indifferent.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Postpone signing documents until you have read them through carefully. Consult a lawyer if you still have doubts. An older person has valuable information to share, steering your career in a new direction.

10 KEY QUESTIONS

1. Do you drink because you are uncomfortable in social situations?
2. Do you drink to build up your self-confidence?
3. Is drinking affecting your relationships with friends?
4. Do you feel guilty or bummed after drinking?
5. Does it bother you if someone says that maybe you drink too much?
6. Do you have to take a drink when you go out on a date?
7. Do you get along better with other people when you drink?
8. Have you lost friends since you started drinking?
9. Do you drink more than most of your friends?
10. Have you started hanging around with a crowd that drinks more than your old friends?

"These 10 Key questions are meant to help you determine whether alcohol is the key to your social life. Use of alcohol to enhance a social occasion is fine - it's when it becomes the main focus of an event that it begins to be a problem. If alcohol becomes your only means of relaxation and entertainment; the only thing that puts you socially at ease or makes you sexually comfortable - then you may find alcohol is playing more of an important role than you expected.

If you, or someone you know, is experiencing problems with alcohol, please contact:

The Truth About Hangover "Remedies"

What do most people do on a Thursday, Friday, or Saturday night to remedy a hard night of heavy drinking? I am sure that if a survey were taken, many students would confess to trying one of the following "remedies":

Option 1	Stuffing the body with as much food as possible, maybe some greasy hot dog with plenty of bun, would absorb most of the alcohol in the stomach, making them "less" drunk and therefore...no hangover!
Option 2	Keeping a case of beer chilling in the fridge, thus providing a great breakfast and a great buzz, and of course, leaving no time for ...a hangover!
Option 3	Taking two extra-strength tylenol before going to bed, the aspirin substitute of course, would somehow reduce the swelling of veins in the head, and therefore...no hangover!!
Option 4	Drinking 5-10 glasses of cold water before going to bed, this would flush out the system and replenish the body, of course preventing that dry, yuk mouth, and therefore...no hangover!

So what do you think? Do you think these remedies actually, physically prevent a hangover? WRONG!! Actually, Aspirin or aspirin substitute won't prevent a hangover. Eating food or drinking water before going to bed won't make you "less" drunk - your body will first metabolize all the alcohol in your system at a rate of one drink per hour before it even begins to tackle that greasy food! And we all know that drinking the next morning won't prevent a hangover, it will just prolong one. So what works?...

O.K., I'll admit it, at the beginning of last semester I wouldn't have known if these "remedy myths" were really true or not. Actually, I wouldn't know a lot of things I now know about alcohol and drugs.
Last semester, eager to find a fifth class (which wasn't the easiest thing to do with all the budget cuts) I stumbled upon the Peer Alcohol and Drug Education Program here at UMASS. The two semester, 6 credit program trains students to facilitate workshops which aim to "increase knowledge about alcohol/drugs and its effects, encourage attitude examination, and foster responsible decision making concerning the personal and collective use of alcohol."

The class is taught in a fun, workshop format where students are able to receive first hand experience on related subjects. Activities like a trip to the Campus police station to see how a breathalyzer test is given, attending an Alcohol Anonymous meeting, and other experiences have aided in my understanding of Alcoholism and Drug addiction. The program has really made me think about my own personal use, as well as society's use.

I will be the first to admit that I am not an expert on the subject, but the class has allowed me to share what I have learned with other students. It has given me the confidence to speak in front of other people, and most of all, I no longer subject myself to any of those torturous "remedy myths" that DON'T WORK!! I prevent hangovers by not drinking too much to begin with. That's the only hangover cure!

performer in the United States and reinforced that ranking to UMass by winning the all-around competition with a 56.3.

There was one very encouraging sign for UMass in this meet that may be important down the last big stretch of the season — the return of Cal Booker. Booker had been off to a slow start this season after a big freshman campaign in which he became one of the Minutemen's top all-arounders. Saturday, after five meets, Booker finally returned to the form that Johnson wants to see.

His 54.1 put Booker in third place behind Roth and Temple's Joe Rowlette. It was a personal best for Booker who also broke the school record in the floor exercise where he hit a 9.7.

"He had a real good performance on floor," Johnson said. "But in the other events, he has room for improvement. He's been doing a little better in practice. Cal's skill level isn't much behind Bill Roth's. He's got to get a little Booker will be an important factor in the Minutemen's stretch run to finish high in the EIGL. "We've lost to the two top teams [Navy and Temple] in the league but we've beat the two teams [Southern Connecticut and East Stroudsburg] at the bottom. The next three meets will determine where we fit in with those teams.

earned the top spot followed by Turmail's 9.35 which edged out UNH's third place finisher, Susy Quinlin, who scored a 9.3. The Minutewomen ended up beating the Wildcats 46.2-45.55 on the vault.

In the second event of the rotation, the Minutewomen appeared to lose their momentum on the uneven bars, allowing UNH to set the pace of the meet. Marshall coming off her 9.55 on the vault, began her routine smoothly, but ran into trouble, falling off the bars, knocking the wind out of her and suffering bruised ribs. Erika Baxter would be the only Minutewoman to place in the top three, earning second with a 9.3, right behind the Wildcats' Laura Bradley's 9.4. "Tammy was a little shaken up, but refused to be taken out," Mitchell said.

The Minutewomen, scoring above 180 for the second time this season, dominated the individual total finishes with Baxter at the head of the pack, scoring a 36.85, followed by Turmail's 36.55. Marshall and Grady followed behind in third and fourth, respectively.

Men's hoop to battle URI

Minutemen return to Cage tonight after loss at St. Joe's

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Boy, Jan. 9 sure seems like an eternity ago, eh?

That was the night the University of Massachusetts men's basketball game seemingly put to rest all claims that it couldn't win on the road, especially in the Atlantic 10.

The Minutemen traveled to one of the most haunted of houses in the conference, rickety old Keaney Gymnasium, and stunned one and all with a 63-57 win over the University of Rhode Island.

Cary Herer leads the men's hoop team tonight (7:30) at the Cage.

That was then, though. This is now, and maybe we need a reminder that UMass hasn't won a game outside of the Happy Valley since. Seven straight road losses in conference play have brought the Minutemen back to Earth, the last of which came last Saturday when they sleepwalked their way to an 81-75 loss to St. Joseph's University at Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse in Philadelphia.

True, some of the games have been legit. Penn State, Temple, West Virginia and Rutgers were solid efforts in tough buildings. But this most recent one doesn't belong in that category.

The Minutemen (12-12, 7-8 in the A-10) shot just 37 percent for the game and after opening a 12-5 lead early, fell into a rut and never escaped from it.

Among the destructors was sophomore forward Craig Amos, who hit an A-10 record 14 straight free throws. The Hawks as a team were a sizzling 32-of-35 (91.4 percent) from the stripe. Richard Stewart added 22 for St. Joe's (7-17, 5-10).

For UMass, it was another solid effort from sophomore William Herndon. As icing for his being named A-10 Co-Player-of-the-Week (along with Amos), Herndon scored 20 points and yanked down 11 rebounds.

Sophomore Jim McCoy added another 20, but was just 7-for-24 from the floor. Freshman Tony Barbee, still bothered by the flu, chipped in with 12 points.

Which brings us to tonight. UMass will surely welcome a return to the friendly Curry Hicks Cage, where that aforementioned Rhode Island team awaits. The Rams are coming off a tight 66-65 win at Duquesne Sunday, and have quietly snuck ahead of the pack into third place in the A-10 (9-5 league, 13-10 overall).

In the process, the Rams have beaten everyone in the conference except UMass. Something says that may be ticking in the back of the mind of coach Al Skinner, who by the way, is a UMass grad and doesn't mind winning here.

Leading the way for the Rams is guard Eric Leslie, who still sits second in the A-10 in scoring at around 23 points per game. Leslie is also the A-10 leader in free throw percentage.

The one to watch is senior center Kenny Green, who when not hampered by his arthritic knees is quite a sight.

Green has been in the top 10 in the league in scoring all season, but he's been dominating the rebounding and blocked shot categories. Green has been averaging nearly 10 boards per game, and leads the nation with 5.0 blocks per outing.

Women's hoop tipped by SBU

Freeman gets 24 for UM

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

All of the ingredients were there for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team to finally break out of its Atlantic 10 Conference slump.

The Minutewomen were coming off an inspiring performance in losing to powerful Penn State Thursday night. With St. Bonaventure, one of the lower-ranking teams in the league, paying a visit as three UMass seniors were playing their final home games at the Curry Hicks Cage Saturday, hopes were high for that elusive second A-10 win.

But the Bonnies wouldn't bite. In front of easily the largest Cage crowd of the season, St. Bonaventure used an eight-point run midway through the second half to take control and walk away with a 66-60 win.

"We didn't play with intensity and we didn't play with hustle," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. "St. Bonaventure definitely played a good game. It was a disappointment for our fans."

A pair of seniors did their best to provide a happy ending to their home careers. Center Helen Freeman came into the contest needing 27 points to become just the fifth player in UM history to reach the 1,000-point plateau. She came close, finishing with a game-high 24, along with eight boards.

Pytko also rose to the challenge, hitting for 16 points while adding four assists and three steals. Junior Keyburn McCusker had a solid game guarding high-scoring Bonnie sophomore Sue Shay.

"I felt Keyburn played a very good defensive game," Hewelt said. "Helen played well, and Michele ran a smart floor game."

Yet it wasn't enough. Offensively, the Minutewomen (4-20 overall, 1-14 A-10) were unable to find that one added touch. At the other end, damage was being done by junior guard Roni Hergenroeder, who seems to have career games whenever she visits Amherst.

Hergenroeder and Shay each had 17 points, but it was Hergenroeder who had several key points in the closing minutes.

Women swimmers finish sixth at NE's

Leary grabs five firsts, three meet records

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

First the bad news. The University of Massachusetts women's swimming team finished in sixth place in this weekend's New England Championships.

The good news is that the women swimmers swam extremely well and placed four swimmers in next weekend's Eastern Championships to be held at the University of Pennsylvania.

"I'm astounded at how well they swam," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb. "Friday, people expected good old Boston College to dominate the relays. Well, we surprised a lot of people, by setting a New England Championship-best time in the 400-meter relay."

Michele Leary, who took three individual and two relay firsts, three of which were meet records, teamed with Denise Reimer, Keira Cruz and Theresa Jacobs for the record 3:32.06 relay swim.

After the great start Friday, UMass proceeded to drop rapidly, but not for a lack of great effort. Tracy Young (one of the four swimmers headed to Pennsylvania), Melissa McCarthy, Jodi Schwartz and Laurie Schwarz all raced extremely well. However, the Minutewomen were unable to pull out of fourth place.

That same day, Leary made swimming history for the New England Championships, as she set a race record in the 50-meter freestyle (23.67 seconds).

Saturday started with the Minutewomen in fifth place, and the team stayed there for most of the day.

"I was expecting fifth or sixth place. I didn't think we could keep up with Northeastern or Providence," Newcomb said.

Saturday's high note came from Schwarz, who qualified for Easterns while the biggest surprise came from Leary, who failed to finish first in the 100-meter butterfly for the first time all season.

But being the great competitor that she is, Leary went right into the 200-meter freestyle and won that event (1:52.86).

"Leary was the best swimmer in the meet throughout the three days, she was the high point scorer for the whole meet," Newcomb said.

Saturday also saw Teresa Konieczny, Jacobs, Amy Bloomstein, Cruz, Nancy Wilkinson and Kim Morin all set lifetime bests in their respective events.

"Our sprinters came through for us," Newcomb said. "We've got one of the best sprint programs in New England. I have no problem being a little cocky and saying something like that."

The Minutewomen may have only finished sixth, but it is clear that this team performed close to its potential.

"We set a lot of lifetime bests, and that's what swimming's all about," Newcomb said.

For some the season is over, but for Leary, Cruz, Schwarz and Young, the season is just beginning. These four move on to the next level hoping to perform their best in strange waters, deep in the heart of Pennsylvania.

Men's gymnastics toppled by Temple

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Temple has not been the friendliest of schools to the University of Massachusetts over the past couple of weeks. The Owls' win over the UMass men's basketball team last weekend was enough to make 4,000 new enemies for Temple.

Temple did it again over the past weekend as the Owls stormed past the UMass men's gymnastics team, 273.8-255.65 in the City of Brotherly Love. The results this time were not as disappointing to UMass coach Roy Johnson, whose team ran into one of the toughest in the nation.

"They were awesome," Johnson said. "Temple just had a real good team. They didn't even have a real good meet. I think they're one of the top 10 teams in the country this year."

The Minutemen did not have their best meet of the year. A very uncharacteristic poor performance on the horizontal bar cost the Minutemen some valuable points. They fell three times on the bar and were given a scare when co-captain John Eggers hit the floor hard on his back.

"It seemed like there was something wrong with the high bar," Johnson said alluding to poor equipment conditions.

Eggers was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for X-rays on Sunday where it was found everything was all right with his back.

There was nothing UMass could do about Bill Roth's all-around performance though. You can't play defense in gymnastics. Roth is the top all-around Women's gymnastics ousts UNH, So. Conn.

The setting couldn't have been better for a Saturday afternoon at Boyden Gymnasium.

At home, the third and fourth ranked teams in the Northeast pitted against each other. The gym packed with fans to cheer the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team on to victory as it earned the top spot with a score of 180.85, defeating the University of New Hampshire's 179.2 and Southern Connecticut State University's 171.

Trailing the Wildcats of UNH by only a point after their uncharacteristic performance on the uneven bars, the Minutewomen, focusing on what needed to be accomplished to win, turned the thermostat up to apply the heat on the balance beam and their last event — the floor exercise — to claim victory.

"We really wanted this win," UMass coach Alfie Mitchell said. "After the uneven bars, we regrouped after being down."

Five out of the six Minutewomen all-arounders scored above 9.0 on the vault as UMass, holding back no punches, rose to the pressure-filled occasion to defeat the Wildcats. Tammy Marshall led the way with a 9.55, while Erika Baxter and Kristin Turmail's 9.4 tied them for second. Kim Grady earned third with a spectacular routine, robbed though in her score as the judges awarded a stingy 9.15.

"Kim had a great routine but she lost her rhythm at one point," Mitchell said. "For that, the judges didn't award her a bonus."

In their first event, the vault, the Minutewomen seemed headed in the right direction toward victory. Marshall's 9.55

Duffey to assume UMass presidency, sources say

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff
and the Associated Press

University of Massachusetts President David Knapp is expected to retire this week and the board of trustees are reportedly planning to ask Chancellor Duffey to serve as president as well as chancellor, sources said last night.

Rumors about Knapp's impending retirement have been circulating for months, but confirmed reports surfaced yesterday that the president plans to announce the end of his 12-year tenure at the trustees meeting this week.

Knapp had originally planned to serve as president for 10 years and return to teaching, but he remained at the request of the trustees and because of financial problems at the University.

Paul Tsongas, chairman of the Board of Regents of Higher Education, and Gordon Oakes, chairman of the UMass trustees, confirmed reports yesterday that Knapp is planning to step down.

Oakes said the issue will be discussed today at the trustees meeting in Boston.

Duffey would neither confirm nor deny reports that he is a candidate for Knapp's position. But he confirmed reports that the two offices may be merged and said he will be in Boston intermittently this week to discuss other issues with the trustees and the board of regents.

"I think there is a feeling that some changes need to be made in the president's office for budgetary and other reasons," he said.

Of the possibility that he would assume the joint role, Duffey said: "I have been and remain reluctant to leave the campus."

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima said yesterday the trustees have been discussing merging the UMass president's office with Duffey's position since August.

"I can confirm that we've been talking for a long time about [the fact] that Duffey might take over president of the University jointly with the chancellorship," he said.

The Senate Ways and Means committee proposed eliminating Knapp's office last June to save $750,000 in state money. In July, Gov. Dukakis cut that money, though the Legislature later restored half of it. An additional $1.5 million for the UMass president's office comes from trust funds.

The president's office, which originally was located on the Amherst campus, authorizes payroll, auditing, personnel at the University and also is in charge of overseeing the chancellors at the UMass Worcester, Amherst and Boston campuses.

Duffey refutes GEO's claims

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Responding to recent Graduate Employee Organization criticism and "administration bashing," Chancellor Duffey refuted claims yesterday that University administrators rejected the GEO's attempt to renew negotiations with the administration.

Calling GEO leaders' claims a "cheap shot," Duffey said, "I was not asked to resume negotiations with the GEO."

In a press statement released Monday, the GEO accused Chancellor Duffey of rejecting their offer last Wednesday to return to the negotiating table.

Mark Kenen, GEO coordinating committee member, said GEO leaders attempted to make an appointment to meet with Duffey on Friday but Duffey was not available. On Monday, Kenen said that Duffey's refusal to meet with the GEO "is leaving us no choice but to pursue our March 1 one-day action."

In a letter to the Collegian, Duffey said yesterday: "If the GEO wishes, the administration would be pleased to resume our formal discussions. We would, of course, expect that the organization first call off the March 1 'strike' and provide written assurance that it will not . . . encourage graduate student employees to violate their individual employment contracts with the University."

Theatre group feigns drunkeness

By JARED KELLEHER
Collegian Correspondent

A student actor who feigned drunkeness yesterday afternoon during a skit to discourage alchohol abuse, inadvertently drew two University of Massachusetts police officers and an Amherst Fire Department ambulance to the Hatch.

Alec Myers, an Amherst College student, is a member of Guerilla Theatre, a branch of the Five College alcohol awareness project.

Acting drunk and disorderly, Myers fumbled from the cashier's line to join fellow actors at a table in the popular eating spot.

On his way to the table, Myers began arguing with two other actors and proceeded to drop his tray and collapse on the floor in front of hundreds of students. His fellow actors rolled him over and carried him to safety, concluding their educational skit on social drinking.

Meanwhile, members of the Hatch kitchen staff who believed the skit was genuine, called for assistance, which came in the form of an ambulance and two police officers.

Karen Jacobs, UMass coordinator for the alcohol and drug education program, said the group will be staging a week's worth of events, most of which will involve the element of surprise.

"They were responding to what they thought was real," Jacobs said of the surprised audience. "I was really surprised myself."

"Usually we do information tables, but surprise is the one you need when you put this one together." she said. "Surprise! Like a guerrilla attack, for the people who wouldn't normally come to our table."

Students eating lunch in the Hatch, however, reacted differently to the stage play. After realizing that she had been deceived, UMass junior Andrea Swenson said: "I think it's horrible; wrong place, wrong time and a sick joke."

Jim Berube, a UMass senior, said: "It's really dangerous, like crying wolf."

Earth Day to promote awareness

By JOHN SUTTON
Collegian Staff

What does the Undergraduate Student Senate, Chancellor Duffey, MassPIRG and the Pagan student organization have in common? They all endorsed Earth Day.

Earth Day began 20 years ago as a means of promoting environmental awareness. At that time, public awareness of toxic waste was in its infant stage and 10 million tons of DDT was still used every year. This year's Earth Day, the 20-year anniversary of the annual event held April 22, seeks to enlarge environmental awareness.

In the past year, the Exxon corporation has made the national and international headlines for the consequences of three major oil spills through the environmental landscape of Alaska, the Pacific Ocean and the Arthur Kill wildlife sanctuary, which is located between New Jersey and New York.

Along with Exxon's misfortunes, President Bush has been criticized by environmentalists regarding his presidential campaign promise to be the "environmental president."

The self-proclaimed "environmental president" has not only cut $20 million from Superfund Cleanup for Boston Harbor, but has so far been indifferent in attempting to create new laws concerning acid rain. The Bush administration has claimed they need more research.

Earth Day activities will be a new way for students to enable themselves to create further awareness of the environment and to take action to save the environment.

"It's time to recognize the problems, work to educate ourselves and create long-term solutions," said Aaron Rome, an organizer of UMass Earth Day Coalition 1990 and MassPIRG chairman.

"Earth Day 1990 is unprecedented," said Marlo Doherty, another organizer for the UMass Earth Day Coalition 1990. "A good majority of the active registered student organization will be participating in some way in Earth Day activities, whether with festivities or organizational events."

The environment faces increasing problems with environmental degradation such as the destruction of the planet's rainforests, depletion of the ozone layer, land desertification and diminishing air quality, said the UMass Earth Day Coalition 1990. Along with these concerns, according to the Coalition, it wants to see the an

Sheriff commandeers armory

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — To the sheriff of Hampden County the decision seemed simple. On the one hand, a century-old jail crammed to the point of bursting; on the other, a spacious National Guard armory holding little more than guns and guards.

But sheriff Michael Ashes' decision to commandeer the armory on the strength of a 17th-century peace-keeping statute has proved anything but simple.

The state's legal challenge to the unorthodox prison was put on hold Tuesday when the attorney general's office asked for, and got a 48-hour continuance. Attorneys representing the county had asked that the situation be made permanent.

Ashe said he hadn't expected such strong resistance.

"I can understand the National Guard feeling put upon, being thrust into a situation . . . all I can say is this was not done irrationally. It was not done impulsively," he said.

The sheriff fended-off eviction Monday when a judge granted a temporary restraining order ruling that the prisoners could stay put. Life at the temporary jail got a little more comfortable when the judge ordered the National Guard to turn over keys to the showers and kitchen.

In a news conference after Hampden County Superior Court Judge George Keady granted the continuance, National Guard Gen. Chester Gorski likened Friday's takeover of the armory to a Gestapo operation.

"It was that quick. It was that brutal," Gorski said.

"I take great issue with the term Gestapo," Ashe later responded, saying he has always cooperated with local authorities.

One killed in four shootings

BOSTON (AP) — A 17 year-old male, one of at least three people shot within six hours, was killed, and Mayor Raymond L. Flynn called on residents to tell police if they know of youths, even their children, with guns.

"I am asking each and every person in this city to work with the Police Department to identify young people — they might be their children — who have these guns and to notify the police so action can be taken and these weapons can be turned in," Flynn said Monday night,.

The 17 year-old, whose identity was not revealed immediately, was shot in the head. Police found his body about 6:25 p.m. Monday at Blue Hill Avenue and Esmond Street in the Dorchester section.

Two handguns were found at the scene, but police said it was not determined immediately whether one was used in the shooting.

It was the second fatal shooting in the city during the three-day holiday weekend.

Junior R. Fernandez, 16, of the Dorchester section was fatally shot Saturday while sitting in a car outside his family's grocery store.

Nine killed in Nicaragua

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — The Sandinista government says nine people were killed in clashes with Contra rebels over the past week, but international observers are noting a lull in political violence as general elections near.

The foreigners say they expect Sunday's potentially pivotal balloting to be peaceful, free and fair.

"Over the last two weeks we had been rather worried about possible violence," Iobal Riza of Pakistan, local head of the United Nations mission to observe the elections, said Monday.

"Over the last few days the tone has been lowered," he said, "and we are noticing a willingness by each party to avoid violence."

Tension had shot up over the past two weeks as the leftist Sandinistas and their main challenger, the U.S.-backed United National Opposition coalition, exchanged threats of violence.

President Daniel Ortega, seeking another six-year term, threatened to close the newspaper published by coalition presidential candidate Violeta Barrios de Chamorro and confiscate her house if the Sandinistas win.

He also threatened to seize the home of its vice presidential candidate, Virgilio Godoy.

Godoy had threatened to "make the Sandinistas pay the bill" - an ominous Nicaraguan expression that can imply anything, including death.

Both threats came in campaign speeches, but both sides have since toned down their rhetoric.

As Riza was speaking at a news conference at the foreign correspondents' club in Mangua, the Defense Ministry issued a communique on the clashes with the U.S.-backed Contras.

The one-page statement said Sandinista troops fought Contras in Chontales province in the south on Wednesday and Friday and in Nueva Segovia province in the north on Sunday.

Activist: Ethiopian Jews face hardships

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

In addition to the famine, drought and civil war threatening millions of Ethiopians, a few thousand Ethiopian Jews also face other hardships, a Jewish activist said last night.

David Becker, a representative from the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry, presented a slide show from his recent visit to Ethiopia and discussed his social work with 40 people in the Earthfoods cafeteria.

Becker, who in the summer of 1988 went to Ethiopia to research the Jewish community, said fervent anti-semitism exists there. Other Ethiopian ethnic groups still associate Jews with the devil, and speaking Hebrew is outlawed, he said.

Becker recalled illegally singing the Hebrew prayer, Oseh Shalom Bimromav, with Ethiopian Jews during his recent visit.

"In a remote part of Ethiopia, after trekking through the mountains and mud, to hear the same Hebrew songs [we sing] was incredibly moving," he said.

The goal of Becker's organization is to help Ethiopian Jews immigrate to Israel, he said.

"I don't work for the Israeli government, I am an eyewitness," Becker said. "The Jews of Ethiopia desire to go to Israel and that's what we're working for."

In 1985, in a covert Israeli military maneuver dubbed "Operation Moses," 7,000 Jews were airlifted from the Sudanese desert and transported to Israel. Approximately 15,000 Jews, who were not healthy enough to escape the border, were left behind, he said.

"Those Jews left in Ethiopia are the very old, the very sick, and the very young," Becker said. "Almost every Ethiopian family has been split up the middle."

Becker has put together an art exhibit, "Beta Israel: A House Divided," which is on display at the Student Union Art Gallery until March 8. Through photographs, artifacts and sculpture, he said the exhibit explores the painful division of the Ethiopian-Jewish community.

The Ethiopian civil war has decimated Jewish villages, he said. Rebel armies are sweeping through villages, kidnapping the men for the army and raping the women, he said.

Ethiopian Jews have no ability to defend themselves," he said. "They are not an armed population."

Becker said American students can play a major role in the rescue of Ethiopian Jews by urging Congress to make all U.S. aid to the Ethiopian government contingent upon the country's human rights record, and to demand free emigration for all Ethiopians.

He said a student congressional lobby in Washington is planned for March 27 and 28, and anyone interested should contact Hillel.

"Ethiopians have only two human rights," Becker said. "The right to attend any political rally sponsored by the government, and the right to birth control."

GEO calls for student support

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization coordinating committee yesterday called on all undergraduate and graduate students to support the organization's one-day work stoppage by boycotting classes on March 1.

"Undergraduates, better than anyone else on campus, understand the value of graduate employees. Our struggle is their struggle. When TAs get laid off, sections get cancelled and those that still exist are nearly impossible to get into," the GEO said in a written statement yesterday.

Chancellor Duffey said that the graduate student employee strike will harm the educational process of undergraduates but a boycott of classes by undergraduates will only hurt themselves.

"Undergraduates students will be the ones who will suffer," he said. "Boycotting classes does not seem to be in the best interests of students."

On the agenda for tonight's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting is a motion, proposed by Student Government President Traci Davis, to endorse the GEO's demands by boycotting classes.

The motion also proposes that the Undergraduate Student Senate ask the administration to recognize the GEO as the collective bargaining unit for graduate students.

"I put forth the motion because I think the SGA should support the graduate students," she said.

The Graduate Student Senate is scheduled to consider a motion similar to the Undergraduate Student Senate on Feb. 27.

Jonathan Leavitt, of the Radical Student Union, said his organization will propose a support action at a Union of Undergraduate meeting scheduled for tomorrow at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Leavitt said that an undergraduate strike would be more effective than last fall's strike because the administration is a more approachable target than the Statehouse.

"In the fall we had a target that was basically unreachable," he said. "This one is within reach, this time our voices will be heard."

Critic seeks media consciousness

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

Although internationally-known media critic Jean Kilbourne has researched the image of women in the media for the past 20 years, she does not expect to change the $100 billion a year industry, yet hopes to raise the consciousness of the general public.

Last night at Mt. Holyoke College, Kilbourne presented a lecture "The Naked Truth: Advertising's Image of Women," which closely paralleled her appearance in the award winning film "Killing Us Softly."

Kilbourne said: "It's what we're least conscious of that has the most power over us," adding it is her "goal to bring out the meaning of these advertisements.

"Just about everyone in America feels personally exempt from advertising," Kilbourne said, adding, "the effects of advertising are inescapable."

Americans are exposed to approximately 2,000 advertisements daily, Kilbourne said, noting they sell values, images, concepts of success and worth, love and sexuality, popularity and normalcy, as well as the products themselves.

The critic added: "My second goal is to explore what can be done about [the impact of these messages]." She urged the audience to get involved, write letters to advertising agencies and political officials, and boycott products.

It is not possible to write a letter every time you come across an advertisement that objectifies women, but individuals should focus on specific aspects they find upsetting, she said.

"What is most important to me today is stopping the images of little girls in advertisements." She pointed out the Love's Baby Soft campaign, which pictures a woman in a youthful pink dress revealing cleavage and leg, and reads, "Because innocence is sexier than you think." "The child herself becomes the ideal," Kilbourne said. "One in four girls is molested in the United States, and 25 percent of all rape victims are under [age] eighteen."

Kilbourne cited an example of a judge calling a five-year-old rape victim promiscuous.

As a result of advertising, women focus on self image, she said. Women diet incessantly to keep "that girlish figure," spend billions on cosmetics, and anti-aging products, but diet can't stop curves from developing, and cream can't stop the aging process, she said.

Kilbourne pointed out that models of the past were plump by today's standards, showing Marilyn Monroe posing in a size 12 bathing suit. Today Kilbourne said models are a size four, or six at the largest, and often suffering from anorexia nervosa.

In addition to striving for youth, women are objectified in advertisements, she said. They are often depicted as objects, even dismembered.

Kilbourne said, "Turning a human being into an object is virtually the first step taken toward physical violence."

Kilbourne said, "I'm not saying advertising is solely to blame" adding "there is, however, no aspect more pervasive or persuasive than advertising."

Drug use confronted in men's bathroom; individual struggles, flees Campus Center

A LETTER TO THE UNIVERSITY COMMUNITY

Dear Colleagues:

We have been meeting regularly with representatives of the Graduate Employees organization (GEO) since early January in an attempt to respond to their concerns.

They asked that we rescind the spring 1990 curriculum fees for graduate student employees. In addition to the $800,000 in fee waivers we had already granted, we responded by extending the deadline for applications and guaranteeing fee waivers to all eligible TAs and TOs. They indicated that if we could extend that guarantee to RAs as well, they would consider that an acceptable response. As we told them, we wish to do so and will know in a few days whether it is possible.

They asked that we guarantee there would be no decreases in their numbers this spring. We responded by guaranteeing there would be no decrease in the number if state-funded graduate assistants and no breaking of contracts of grant-funded graduate assistants. They indicated that was an acceptable response.

They asked that we recognize them as the exclusive collective bargaining representative of the graduate student employees without requiring that they go through the usual process of petitioning the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission for an election. We do not have the legal authority to do that, but we told them that we are anxious to work with them toward our common goal of improving the situation of graduate student employees on this campus, and we proposed a formal signed agreement with GEO about the nature of our continuing relationship. That agreement included a promise to discuss certain specified issues in good faith and attempt to reach amicable resolution, and to submit to an extensive dispute resolution process. They indicated that the terms of that agreement were generally acceptable, but that it must be an agreement which includes District 65/United Auto Workers.

Our position is that they are, of course, free to affiliate and seek counsel and assistance as they choose. But, as we told them, we were advised by legal counsel that, since the Labor Commission had ruled that graduate student employees on this campus could not unionize, we could not sign contracts about graduate student employees as part of the United Auto Workers. TheGEO indicated that they would not sign agreements to which District 65/United Auto Workers was not a party, and they abruptly broke off discussions. They told us they would next seek permission from the Auto Workers to call a strike vote.

We are disappointed at this turn of events and hopeful that graduate student employees will honor their obligations to the University and its undergraduate students. Naturally we will proceed with the waiving of fees as described earlier, whatever the outcome of the strike vote.

When Army Capt. Linda Bray led a military police unit to secure a Panamanian military dog kennel during the December U.S. invasion of Panama, she never expected to engage in actual combat. After all, Army regulations forbid female presence in combat zones.

Nevertheless, she and her unit killed three Panamanian soldiers, captured one and successfully gained control of the kennel.

Days later, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater touted Bray's success, which was later down-played by Army spokesmen.

Army spokesman Col. James L. Swank called Bray's actions "grossly exaggerated" by the press and deemed Bray and all other female officers "unavailable for comment until authorized by the secretary of the Army."

'Army policy allows women to be shot first, but they can't shoot first. The logic eludes me.' – Rep. Patricia Shroeder (D-Colo.)

Outraged by the treatment of Bray and the other females who participated in the Panamanian invasion, Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colorado) introduced a bill on Jan. 23, proposing a four-year experiment that would lift current Army restrictions on female Army personnel, allowing them to fully participate in every aspect of the military — including combat.

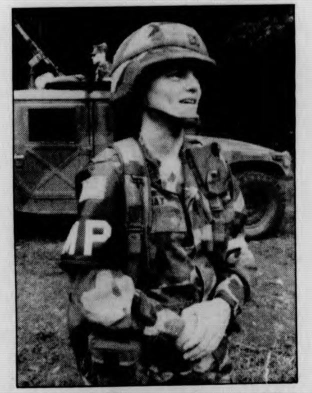
"Have you seen the Army's latest commercial asking women to be all that they can be? The commercial portrays a woman in communications van obviously handling the communications for maneuvers. Assuming that our enemy is intelligent, that woman would be the first hit in a strike," Schroeder said.

"It's always smart to destroy your enemy's lines of communications first," she said. "So let me see if I've got this straight. Army policy allows women to be shot first, but they can't be the first to shoot. The logic eludes me."

Lisa Morena, defense assistant to Schroeder, said the bill is currently pending in the Arms Service Committee awaiting a series of hearings.

Conflicting Opinions

With Bray's actions, the "silencing" of female military personnel and the proposed Schroeder legislation, the issue surrounding women's role in the military and combat has resurfaced in full force.



AP Photo

Captain Linda L. Bray with the 988th Military Police Company poses in the Army's Quarry Heights base in Panama City.

Many of the heated arguments against female participation in combat were addressed in a Navy Times reporter's book.

Brian Mitchell's book, Weak Link, cited service statistics that showed a higher absentee and attrition rate among female military personnel, and a five to 10 percent pregnancy rate as reasons to exclude females from combat.

Saying the inferior physical strength of the female soldiers would weaken the overall performance of the military, Mitchell said, "Using women in combat will only mean that more people will be killed in war."

In her argument before the U.S. House of Representatives, Schroeder, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said the objections to women holding combat positions vary from emotional to practical, but "the competence of military women's performance as individuals has been already acknowledged.

"The exclusionary policies deny the military the services of qualified personnel," she said. "It is time for military service to be based on qualifications, not gender."

Current Military Restrictions

According to Title X of U.S. military codes and a Defense Department Risk Rule, women are excluded from any military occupation that is expected to meet hostile, combat situations, said Capt. R.J. Zangas, Marines spokesman.

Zangas said women are forbidden duty on any vessel or aircraft that is or will be engaged in combat, nor may women be assigned to other than temporary duty on vessels of Navy hospital transports.

"The Marines have 37 different fields of occupation," he said. "According to Title X, women can only go into 33 of them."

Women are forbidden from entering fields involving the infantry, the artillery, tract vehicles (i.e. tanks, personnel carriers, transports) and aviation, Zangas said.

"All Marine aircrafts are drafted for combat, therefore we have no female pilots," he said.

Female Marines do not receive the same type of physical training as males do and are expected to be less fit, he said. "Women are not trained offensively, they are only trained to defend themselves," Zangas said.

Zangas said that despite these restrictions, women are not prevented from climbing the career ladder.

The Marine Corps does have two female brigadier generals, Zangas said, and that in fiscal year 1989 there were 6,960 female officers and approximately 9,000 female enlisted personnel.

The number of female officers comprises 3.5 percent of Marine officers, and the female personnel number reflects 5.1 percent of enlisted Marines, he said.

Lieutenant Bruce Williams, Navy spokesman, said even though women have been in the Navy since 1913, only 10 percent of the officers are female.

Williams also cited Title X as a restriction for female personnel prohibiting career advancement in certain sectors of the Navy.

"Women are fairly well-integrated into the Navy," he said. "I have personally worked with women and have found no problems in their ability to do the job."

Full Female Participation

Capt. Rodley Millet, who has worked for Air Force air defense for 19 years, said he has worked with women and has had no problems.

He said during a tense, hostile survey of the Persian Gulf last year, he flew in an unarmed craft with female crew members.

Millet said he had no problem with having the women on-board. "They were very competent," he said.

"Personally, I believe that the private sector frowns on women in combat," he said. "But things change, it's just a matter of time."

Backed by proposed legislation and intense media attention, Millet said women now have a "voice" that will force full gender integration of the armed services.

A military officer said he would fully support women's entrance into combat.

"After all, we do live in a free country," he said. "Women have proved qualified to do anything they want to."

Saying that if his identity were revealed he could lose his job, the officer denounced the restrictive military codes calling them "well-intentioned" but detrimental.

"These codes were well-meant but they were simply males just trying to protect their women-folk," he said.

Changing Times

Captain Bray said last month in U.S. News and World Report she hopes her success in Panama has made a strong statement to the world.

"It used to be that just because you were a female you would not be able to fight. This is no longer true," she said.

Using Bray's Panama example, Schroeder said on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" that women and men "could go into combat together and bond."

Expressing hope that the youth will view women and men on a more equal level, she commented, "This is a generation that grew up playing soccer together. They really do see women as teammates."

'Using women in combat will only mean that more people will be killed in war.' –Brian Mitchell, author of Weak Link

Whether the Schroeder bill ever comes to a full-house vote or dies in sub-committee, the issue of women's role in combat has set an agenda for equal opportunity to finally permeate the one establishment that has, for most of its existence, locked women out.

'Just Cause' fails to comply

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

When a Senior Airman from a U.S. Air Force base was given 20 minutes notice before boarding a plane headed for a Panamanian combat zone, she was a bit surprised.

"Other men on the plane and on the ground [in Panama] were very surprised that I went, that many women went, on this operation," she said.

Why were they surprised? The airman was a woman, and current codes prohibit the presence or assignment of female personnel in combat zones.

Due to possible violations of the Defense Department risk rule, she said she was not supposed to be in combat and could face reparations from the military. She asked that a pseudonym be used.

Mary Smith's assignment was to document U.S. Air Force activities during December's operation Just Cause — in the thick of fire fights.

On the Wednesday of the invasion, Smith said she was given 20 minutes to get ready. "I was very tense. Everyone was very tense," she said.

On the way down to Panama, Smith said her plane picked up a number of female military police personnel from Fort Bragg, N.C., and one woman from Ford Ord, Calif.

"When we landed in the combat zone, we didn't stay on the ground very long," she said.

Her plane left minutes after it landed in the hostile territory, she said.

When the plane finally landed, Smith, armed with an M-16, set up communications and began shooting photos.

"Everything [women do] is restricted from going off-base," Smith said even though she and many other women were obviously off-base and in a combat zone.

Smith's photos appeared in a military newspaper which documented the Panama invasion.

Praising Army Capt. Linda Bray's exploits, Smith said, "Women aren't allowed in the infantry and there are no female fighter pilots. Yet, [Bray] successfully led a brigade into combat."

Since operation Just Cause, Smith said that the Air Force has changed regulations, removing combat restrictions from female presence in C-130 and C-140 aircrafts.

"They are definitely easing regulations in the Air Force," she said adding that women should be officially permitted to participate in every aspect of military life.

"Personally, I think it should be up to the individual," she said. "If women volunteer [for combat] and are capable, they should be allowed to do whatever they want to."

Smith rebutted arguments against female presence in combat by challenging people to prove that women would do poorly, as compared to their male counterparts.

Late Night with Graver at Bowker

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Okay everybody, imagine a plastic pane of the Amherst skyline and Bill Wendell, announcer for the Late Night with David Letterman reading this:

"Well, we're not in New York and Dave ain't here either but we have the next best thing, Fred Graver, staff writer for the show."

Not to confuse anyone but Bill Wendell won't be here either. But it is still going to be a funny night as Fred Graver, three-time Emmy award winning writer, presents a lecture titled, "Behind the Scenes at Late Night with David Letterman," on Feb. 26 in Bowker Auditorium.

Graver, who is part of the Distinguished Visitors Program for this spring, plans to include a video presentation and "a special surprise specifically for UMass" with his lecture.

Graver has written for Late Night for three and half years and according to his "Top Ten Things You Should Know About Fred Graver," he still has a hard time explaining to his kids why "he gets paid for thinking about tossing turkeys off a five-story building."

Graver, a native Chicagoan (maybe that's why Dave did the show from Chicago last spring), previously worked for two years as a writer and editor for the National Lampoon.

While at the Lampoon, Graver lectured on comedy writing at Brown University, Yale University and Dartmouth College. Although there is controversy over what college Animal House represents, Graver claims to have visited it while at Dartmouth. He states in his "Top Ten" list that it was "really boring."

Graver has also written for the Off the Wall Street Journal, a parody of the capitalist newspaper, MTV, Nickelodeon and Bantam Publishing.

Tickets, for the good ol' American price of FREE, will be available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office for Five-College students and available to the general public beginning Feb. 22.

Low turnout at voter registration drive

The student turnout for a voter registration drive yesterday in the Student Union was disappointing, Town Clerk Cornelia Como said yesterday.

"It was a very, very low turnout," she said. "We always have good turnouts at the University."

Como said 44 students registered to vote yesterday. Last November, during the student boycott of classes to protest state budget cuts in education, nearly 4,000 students registered to vote at a three-day drive, she said.

The town clerk planned this registration drive to last for two days. The drive will continue tomorrow from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. at the Town Clerk's Office in Amherst Town Hall.

Como said students have the option to register in Amherst or in their home town. Yesterday, exactly half of the 44 new registerees opted to register in Amherst, she said.

The registration drive was requested by University of Massachusetts students Robb Smith, Brian Crawford and Eric Nakajima, who petitioned the Amherst Board of Registrars to conduct this drive, Como said.

Como said she had no idea why the student turnout for the first day of the drive was so low. She said it may have been because of poor advance publicity.

In addition, she said students traditionally have not been enthused about local politics.

"Usually town elections are not popular with the students anyway," Como said. "They are usually only interested in state and presidential elections."

DEANS LIST
FALL SEMESTER 1989

Congratulations to those who qualified for the Deans List. Your academic performance is noteworthy and a source of pride to the faculty, staff, your student colleagues and, of course, to your parents. Such outstanding academic achievement (3.5 or higher semester average with twelve or more graded credits) is attained by fewer than 15% of our undergraduates. Providing opportunities for academic growth remains one of the University's highest priorities. It is especially pleasing therefore, to note and call attention to such accomplishment. Thank you for the credit you bring to the University.

Joseph Duffey, Chancellor

PRESS RELEASES

To publicize your achievement, the University News Office will be issuing a press release to your hometown newspaper if you are a Massachusetts resident. Out of state students are requested to pick up a press release form at 200 Munson Hall (second floor). For additional questions, please call 545-0444.

ADDITIONS

The Deans List was based on grades received and posted by the Registrar's Office by January 31, 1990. If you had a grade change after that date (including making up an "incomplete" or had a missing or late grade recorded after January 31), and believe you now qualify for Deans List status, please fill out a form available at the Information Data Bank, 227 Whitmore, and attach verification. Reminder: graded credits only are calculated, not pass/fail credits.

Paid for by Student Affairs Information Services as a service to the campus community.

A closer look at the map

The United Nations is filled with dozens of Monty Hall diplomats, all urging Israel to play "Let's make a deal" with the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Darren Garnick

Israel controls the West Bank and the Gaza strip, two pieces of land inhabited by people who understandably hate her guts. But she could trade this land to the Palestinians for what is behind curtain number one. The mystery prize might be peace.

Trading land for peace sounds like a reasonable deal. Surely, it is worth giving up a pile of sand if it means saving lives. In Israel's case, however, unconditionally surrendering all of the West Bank and Gaza is clearly suicidal.

Squint at a globe and try to locate Israel. If your eyesight is poor, look for her neighbors: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Sudan, Algeria, Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Mauritania, Morocco, Tunisia, Djibouti, North Yemen, South Yemen, Oman, Bahrain, United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Qatar, Somalia and Jordan.

The 21 nations mentioned above, all members of the Arab League, have a combined size of 5.3 million square miles. Israel, at 8,300 square miles, can fit into this land 640 times.

This would be all fine and dandy if everyone were friends. But the Arab League, through economic, military and diplomatic means, is dedicated to Israeli euthanasia. After the 1979 Camp David Accords, Egypt was booted out of the Arab League for making peace with Israel. Although Egypt was begrudgingly readmitted 10 years later, the League still dreams of Israel's death.

The PLO wants a 22nd Arab state, "Palestine," to be created out of the West Bank and Gaza. "Palestine" would obviously be militarily allied with the Arab League. It is likely this new nation would buy some new tanks.

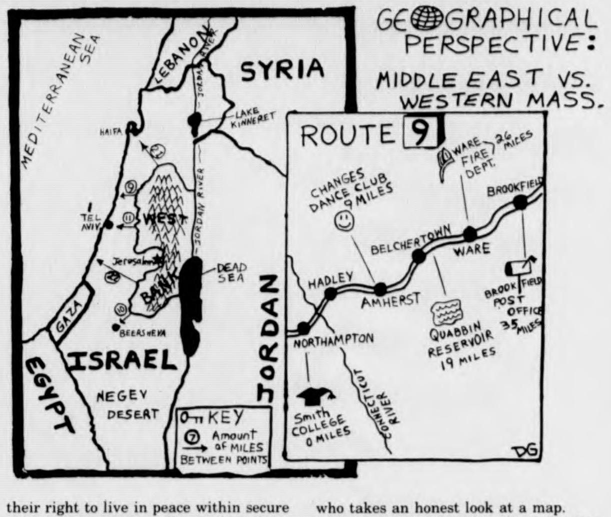
Focus solely on the map of Israel. Withdrawal from the West Bank would carve the upper half of Israel, the non-desert half, into a narrow coastal scrap. Since 75 percent of its population lives in that scrap, Israel is not paranoid to fear for her survival.

At its narrowest point, Israel would be nine miles wide. Nine miles is a short bike ride. The cheesiest artillery pieces fire nine miles.

Almost never drawn on maps is a mountain range which covers most of the West Bank. High elevation-based weapons aimed at the poor suckers living in that nine mile strip would reap splendid casualty numbers for Israel's enemies.

Israel cannot negotiate with the earth over its geography. Those mountains cannot be moved.

PLO chairman Yasser Arafat says he accepts UN resolution 242 which calls for the "territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts or force."



If indeed Arafat really believes Israel has a right to secure borders, he should carve his state somewhere else. But naturally, Israeli safety is not his concern. Sworn enemies do not act in each other's best interests.

Suggesting that Israel's pre-1967 borders are safe and secure is ludicrous to anyone who takes an honest look at a map.

The root of the Arab/Israeli conflict has not been real estate. To make peace with Egypt, Israel gave up the oil-rich Sinai peninsula. The Sinai is approximately three times Israel's size.

Geographically, Israel is a fly in a vat of Arab soup. The world is now fighting over who gets to pull off the wings.

Overcome the myths of rape

Rape.

It is hard for many of us to think about rape and the realities associated with it, and oftentimes our minds are clouded by myths that distract us from some important issues.

Minu Sebastian

Here are some common myths associated with rape:

1)The woman asked for it.

2)Rape is an impulsive act of sexual frustration.

3)Rape usually occurs at night by strangers in secluded areas.

4)Rapists are psychopathic.

5)The victim is always female.

Here are the facts:

1) Rape is not sex. It is a crime of violence and power. It is a violation of a person on a physical and emotional level. A person feels a total loss of control over his/her life. No one asks for an experience like this.

2) This myth implies that rapists are animals who have no control over their sexual drive and desire. This is not true. Ninety percent of all rapes are considered planned or premeditated, and 40 percent of all rapists have an active sexual partner or are married.

3) Rape occurs everywhere. Sixty-five percent of all rapes occur in the home of the victim or assailant. In over 50 percent of reported rapes, the rapist knew the victim well.

4) Only three percent of all rapes are the psychotic experiences which we see in the media. Rapists differ from "normal" men in that they tend to be more aggressive and are insecure. These men usually are caught up in their "macho" roles.

5) Ninety-three percent of rape victims are female and seven percent are male. One out of every seven males under age 18 will be a victim of sexual assault.

These facts and figures should be giving us a strong message.

There is something wrong in our culture and society that is producing men and, in some instances, women who are capable of such acts. And they are not random "crazy" people. They are average people who are generally regarded as "normal."

What is it about our culture that allows for people to become individuals capable of such atrocious acts?

The media could be one factor. The way in which rape is portrayed on t.v. often forms the myths that we carry in our minds.

The continual objectification of women in magazines, advertisements and pornography could be another factor.

In addition, the sexual stereotyping of women and men on t.v. form expectations of ourselves and our sexual partners that are inaccurate.

So, what can we do?

Do we start banning t.v., magazines and pornography?

No. But we can become aware of the impact of these forms of media on ourselves and realize that these are some of the factors which can lead to violence and conflict.

The Educator/Advocate Program of the Everywoman's Center offers various workshops for men and women on different issues including rape, media imaging and advertising, and pornography.

There is also a 24-hour emergency number for victims (men and women) of sexual assault: This number contacts you with counselors and advocates, 545-0800.

The long term solution to rape is education. We should stay aware that a problem exists. And it is imperative for us to realize that the media and other factors in our culture could be affecting us in ways of which we are unconscious.

And the problem is not out in the "real" world somewhere. We are part of it.

A recent Student Affairs Research Evaluation Office survey reported that 23 percent of UMass women (who responded to the survey) have been victims of rape or attempted rape.

Clogged ear turbulence

I was on a plane headed for Boston. Everything was going okay. Visibility was good. Plane was new. We took off, we flew, we landed. Fine. But, as you and I both know, something had to go wrong.

"Bri," I yelled to my roommate as I awoke the following morning. "What happened to my ear?!"

"You mailed it to your girlfriend," he replied, "You were drunk, remember? It was right after you screwed up that Motif number 1 color-by-number. You painted an 11 instead of a 3, and you just went nutso."

Steven Brykman

"No, seriously. My right ear isn't working."

"Well, maybe you're deaf."

"What?"

Apparently, my right ear had decided it was getting sick and tired of vibrating for my convenience, and had decided to go to the Bahamas for awhile. I called Health Services and told the doctor that my ear had taken an unpaid vacation.

"Well," the doctor asked, "Where do you think it went?"

"I dunno. As an educated guess, I'd say the Bahamas."

Fact was, at times, I had heard this odd whispering in my right ear. It said things like, "You wanna go to the Bahamas. It's wicked bettah in the Bahamas." What that "it" was, the voice never specified. I figured "it" meant the local TV cable programming, or something like that.

What had happened to my ear was the equivalent to what happens to most ears at 20,000 feet. Y'know, the time when the plane levels off, the stewardess walks by with a cart, and everybody yells for Coke and peanuts. Only it happened to my ear at an altitude of four and a half feet, in the top bunk.

"What do I gotta do to get rid of it," I asked the doctor, "Visit the grand canyon?"

"Have you tried yawning?"

"Tried it."

"You tried swallowing?"

"I swallowed, I swallowed. Doc, I swallowed everything from Moxie to V8."

"Hold your nose and blow?"

"I blew. I blew soft, I blew hard. Doc, I blew so hard I thought my eyes were gonna pop out."

"Y'know," the doctor remarked, "That happened once, back in '63, to a fella in Missouri. Poor fella. Let's see, did you try sticking a firecracker in your ear?"

"Tried it. Got written up violating quiet hours."

"Well, sometimes you gotta use an M-80."

Here, in case you ever find yourself in a similar predicament, is the patented Brykman method for clogged ears:

1)Press ear. At this time you should hear what sounds like rushing air. Presumably, this allows a release of pressure. 2)Hold nose and blow. Placing a Kleenex under the nose is advised.

Soon, the ear should pop, and your hearing will be regained. If that doesn't work, try an M-80.

Duffey calls to resume talks

The Feb. 20 issue of the Collegian reported that the GEO has issued a press statement "blasting the University of Massachusetts administration's rejection of the GEO's offer to return to the negotiating table." In fact, the GEO, which unilaterally broke off talks with the administration last week, has not asked to resume those talks. Marc Kenen did ask for a meeting with me, which was not taken as an offer to resume discussions between our respective committees established for the purpose of those discussions.

If the GEO wishes, the administration would be pleased to resume our formal discussions. We would, of course, expect that the organization first call off the March 1 "strike" and provide written assurance that it will not, for a specified period of time while we are engaged in further discussion, encourage graduate student employees to violate their individual employment contracts with the University.

We join Mr. Kenen in his hope that we can "continue a productive and respectful dialogue." We do not believe that walking out of discussions and voting not to work when there are disagreements is conducive to progress in our mutual efforts.

Joseph Duffey
Chancellor

Duffey reacts to GEO

Last Wednesday, GEO negotiators broke off talks with the administration, claiming that the major sticking point was the University's failure to acknowledge the GEO affiliation with the United Auto Workers Union/District 65.

In a meeting Thursday night, the GEO voted in favor of a one-day work stoppage March 1 and overwhelmingly authorized a strike.

Provost Richard O'Brien expressed interest in resuming discussions with the GEO, but added, "If they want to resume discussion, they should call off the strike."

O'Brien said the administration could not negotiate with the GEO if they were on the "edge of walking out with every dispute."

Referring to recent news articles quoting GEO members, O'Brien said, "I regret the tone of rhetoric and attack on individuals. It certainly doesn't help to resolve this problem."

The University has not recognized the GEO as a bargaining unit, O'Brien said, and the University is still bound by the Massachusetts Labor Relations ruling in 1979 and could not autonomously acknowledge its affiliation with the United Auto Workers Union/District 65.

end to the "senseless" production of hazardous waste, and species extinction, resulting from human abuse of the planet and its natural resources.

The UMass Earth Day 1990 Coalition says it is committed to educating the community about these problems and taking action to resolve them.

The coalition claims that every minute, an area of tropical rainforest equivalent to 80 football fields falls prey to development. Moreover, they claim that every year, the amount of rainforest permanently destroyed equals the size of the state of Maine.

Every year, 2.7 million pounds of toxic chemicals are released into the atmosphere, according to Rome. Rome says this is another issue that the Earth Day Coalition will work to address.

One of the goals of the coalition is to have half of the campus sign pledges committing themselves to acting environmentally sound in their daily routine.

Another plan of action is to activate citizens through letter-writing campaigns to elected officials.

For more information on Earth Day is available in the MassPirg office, located in Student Union room 423B.

Jewish culture from Miami

By JAMES LARKIN
Collegian Correspondent

Joel Saxe's documentary work-in-progress, "Scenes From Miami Beach," focuses on the communities of Yiddish folk singers and Jewish immigrant radicals in Miami and New York. Saxe has been documenting the Ocean Drive Friendship Circle, made up of several dozen singers and instrumentalists, since 1985.

Saxe, a graduate student in the UMass communications department, has been intrigued with Jewish culture since childhood. Having grown up in Miami, Saxe first took part in the Ocean Drive gatherings with his grandfather in the 1960s. Saxe noted, "In these people and this culture that I grew up around there was something that was very much alive."

A segment of the series, "Neither Silver, Neither Gold," examines folk singer Mendel Lieberman. At first glance, it resembles comedian Billy Crystal doing his impression of his Jewish grandfather.

Saxe however, is able to move beyond this caricature and reveal an individual with humor, strength and unique talent. This segment also shows the "schmoozing" — chatting, singing, storytelling and jokes — of the elderly immigrants. These gatherings allowed them to "be out there under the sun and be together as a people," Saxe said.

"Part of my desire is to do oral history," Saxe added. "To look at the function of folk songs and cultural expression in someone's life and how it creates an elevated spirit."

In his series, Saxe is able to both inform and entertain. Saxe develops a rapport with these people that allows them to speak freely and come alive as artists, showing the viewer how these elderly, Eastern-European immigrants created one of the most vibrant communities of Yiddish culture in the world.

"These people came out of a tradition where they were oppressed. To some extent, what defined their Jewish identity was that they were not part of the mainstream," Saxe said.

New UVC lunch time fun

By ANTONIA MAGUIRE
Collegian Correspondent

Have you ever walked by the Hatch and wondered what it is that always seems to be on that screen? I have. But now I wonder no more. It's Union Video Center lunchtime entertainment, and this week on the menu is the new hour-long video, Avant Garage, which will be shown today, tomorrow and Friday lunchtimes.

Comprised of about 20 pieces, this highly colorful plethora of comic sketches, music videos and examples of the truly absurd is worth as many minutes as you can spare. Each piece is about 3 or 4 minutes long, and every one is different.

The opening sequence, for example, is a series of images on the theme of war and destruction and is set to the music of "Groove Commander."

From there, Avant Garage takes you into the world of "Art is where you find it." John Furbish is the producer. "The Fishbowl Video," is a bizarre collection of interviews conducted on campus on the merits of creamed corn and underarm deodorant for ritualistic purposes.

Other skits and sketches include a bizarre example of performance video, some of the work of John Grillo and advice on the benefits of building your very own beach.

This is the second Avant Garage collection to be shown by the Union Video Center. Its creators Bob Berger and Phil MacNamara hope to make it a bi-monthly affair.

They see Avant Garage as a forum for budding camera people and artists with new and exciting ideas. UVC, they say, will provide a film crew for anyone with an idea or script, be it art, comedy, music or the truly absurd, and vice versa. The material will be edited by them for Avant Garage but they insist that they are "two wild and crazy guys for whom anything goes."

If Avant Garage sounds exactly like what you need to get motivated, drop in on the UVC office next to the Hatch. Meanwhile, catch the Avant Garage lunchtime entertainment on the screens at the top of the Student Union steps by the door to the Hatch and other campus center locations.

Grennan: more talk, less rock

By AL KAUFMAN

Winston Grennan
Twister's
Saturday, Feb. 17

Jamaican drummer Winston Grennan likes to talk. That's too bad. Every time he opened his mouth, either the word "yes" or some cliche like, "let's get back to the roots" would come out. Many, many times.

If he wasn't repeating those phrases, he was busy hyping himself and his new cassette. There's nothing wrong with that, every star does it. But not to the extent of Winston Grennan.

Thankfully, music was also played. And when it was, it was done well. Grennan, who has drummed for the likes of Bob Marley and Jimmy Cliff, is beginning to show his age. At times, it looked to be a burden for him to lift his drumsticks. But he always kept the beat, often at lightning speed.

Grennan claims to have created a new music, called "swegway." It seems to be nothing more than reggae with a horn. But that's petty. The music was still powered with a strong reggae beat that screamed to be danced to.

It's a pity two members of Grennan's Ska Rocks band were not at the gig because they missed their flight. The remaining four members were vaguely interested in stage presence and at times looked rather bored on stage.

But the crowd didn't care. They didn't even care that when Grennan played his own songs, the lyrics were of a stream of consciousness nature. The people just wanted to dance and Grennan's Ska Rocks Band gave them the opportunity.

Grennan was at his best when he covered other people's reggae tunes, such as Marley's "Simmerdown." In songs such as these, the words rhymed and the lyrics were more than just strewn together cliches. They showed why Grennan never reached the national acclaim he feels he deserves.

Winston Grennan is a capable drummer who can play a good reggae beat. He did that Saturday night at Twister's, and nothing more.

Hollywood finally gets a conscience

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Staff

As we ride into the sunset of the Reagan-era, Hollywood is slowly relinquishing the crass commercialism that defined its crude excuse for variety on the screen. The 80s will best be remembered for its stunning mediocrity, but 1989 marked a transition period where the talents of Woody Allen, Oliver Stone and Danny DeVito dared to slap us across the face, sobering us from a decade-long lull in social consciousness.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Allen's Crimes and Misdemeanors was a stunning indictment of the moral vacuum that devoured the 80s: a decade where social standing and power passed as substitutes for the human soul, and honesty and concern were met with ridicule and misunderstanding. Allen challenged us to vindicate his morally corrupt opthomologist (Martin Landau) as he plotted to kill his guilt-ridden mistress.

The brilliance of Allen's work lies within his understanding of our thinking. Allen knows this is a society where the crimes of a Wade Boggs are parodied rather than chastised, and he plays on this with scathing ferocity. He's taken the complete system of messages and images that have plagued the 80s and has turned them against us, defying us to reject them. The results are numbing and powerful: exposing a societal mindset that has created a whole generation of villains and anti-heroes who have conveniently blurred the distinction between right and wrong.

Stone's epic, Born on the Fourth of July, isn't simply an indictment on the U.S. propaganda that seduced thousands of young Marines like Ron Kovic, but also dares to attack the American ideal of "manhood." Paralyzed from the mid-chest down, Tom Cruise's Kovic is forced to redefine his self-identity and self-esteem after a bullet takes away his sexual reproduction capabilities. In a decade where "manhood" is blurred with "machismo," Stone indirectly attacks the dehumanizing system of messages that promotes such self-defeating attitudes and icons. Wounded as a virgin, Kovic's pain is a wrenching testament to the vicious backlash of a system that exploits individual needs and and emotions, forcing people to question their worth as humans.

Danny DeVito's War of the Roses zeroes in on the crass materialism that has replaced values with commodities, playing it out within the cruel paradox of "civil divorce." When Michael Douglas' career obsession eclipses his marriage, wife Kathleen Turner searches for self-worth amidst the glamorous furnishings of their mansion. As the marriage dissolves, the Rose's pleasuredome becomes a war zone, as they seek to hurt one another by destroying each other's prized possessions. The brutality of the film stems from its tragic emptiness: there is no love, no understanding of the other person outside of what he or she has purchased to preserve the facade of their happy existence.

When the chandelier they cling to crashes to the floor, Turner offers the gesture of the decade. As they lay dying, Douglas reaches to touch her cheek, but she tosses his hand away: Yuppie love immortalized in the cruelty and emptiness of materialism.

Hollywood is slowly coming out of its deep sleep as we cross the horizon of a new decade. Controversy and self-examination are creeping back into the mainstream, as the social novocaine of the Reagan-era is finally beginning to wear off.

Acting saves play

By ALISA HABIB
Collegian Staff

Abingdon Square
Amherst College
Friday, Feb. 16

Being pretty, vivacious, and fifteen, a girl has the world at her fingertips. But when she's married to a man the age of her grandfather, life tends to be a little disappointing.

Maria Irene Forbes' "Abingdon Square" depicts the tragic ordeal of a young girl, balancing on the edge of womanhood, whose youth is crushed when she marries a man close to retirement.

Marion, played by Dawn Heinecken, has just suffered the loss of her mother. In her despair, she finds a friend in a much older man, Juster (Peter Lobdell). Her naivete and innocence disillusion her into replacing a deep friendship with romantic love. Juster, who just suffered the loss of his wife, is overwhelmed by her. The two come together out of need, but fail to see the consequences of their union.

The play gets off to a slow start with their marriage. The first few scenes are short and dry. The first point of interest comes when Marion's cousin introduces her to the concept of a menage a trois. This is the first time Marion realizes she is missing something in her life.

Through the next few scenes, Marion's life, like the play, drags on, becoming more hollow by the day. Her milk toast husband fails to see that she is being denied most of life's experiences.

As the years pass, Marion matures and realizes that she has no self-identity. She constructs an imagined life and an imagined lover. As the tension grows, the play becomes more absorbing.

The second act is much more powerful. Juster turns out to have more fire in him than one would imagine. Marion has become a woman and has rebelled against her situation. The two reach a climactic point of conflict, then slowly descend into madness.

The last half of the play is riveting as man and woman fight for their own passions, but realize that their love for each other has grown too great for them to separate.

Dawn Heinecken gives an enthusiastic performance. Playing opposite her, Peter Lobdell makes a surprising turn from an almost non-exsistent personality to an outstandingly strong character. His portrayal of an elderly man driven mad by love shows extreme talent. Elizabeth Gottlieb, who plays Marion's great aunt, Minnie, also gives a laudable performance.

THIRD WORLD AFFAIRS

Mandela: from frying pan into fire?

The italicized quotes are from Nelson Mandela's dramatic speech after his release from 28 years of confinement in apartheid dungeons. Each quote is followed by a set of truths that we hold to be self-evident.

The factors which necessitated the armed struggle still exist today. We have no option but to continue.

Mandela's release signifies the triumph of the principle that Third World people will refuse to surrender the right to engage in armed struggle in self defence, when confronted by colonialism in any form.

The reality of the South Africa into which Mandela has emerged is one of jails and torture, poverty stricken ghettoes and Whites wallowing in the profits of slave labor.

Dastidar/Josias

What are the men and women of Umkhonto we Sizwe, the armed wing of the African National Congress (ANC), up against? Thousands of battle tanks, Africa's largest supersonic air fleets, carrier battle groups, and a sinister arsenal of atomic weapons.

Do you really support racial equality in South Africa? Can your government live with this awesome military machine proportionately controlled by people like Tambo, Mandela and Slovo? If not, that's ok. Send your donations to the Afrikaners. Ignore the historical reality that the violence practiced by Europeans in terms of tons of explosive detonated, far exceeds corresponding use by people of color. The South Africans of color respect life just like any of you (hopefully) do.

I salute the South African Communist Party (SACP) for its steady contribution to the struggle for democracy . . . We are heartened by the fact that the alliance between ourselves and the party remains as strong as it always was.

The current chief of staff of the military wing of the ANC, Chris Hani, and most other top guerilla leaders, are members of the SACP. This party was racially integrated as far back as the '30s. The Oct. issue of the London-based African Confidential reported that 25 of the 35 members of the ANC's policy making National Executive Committee are members of the SACP. Great patriots like Govan Mbeki and Joe Slovo are all SACP members. The ANC embraces all ideologies, and respect is based on courage and dedication, not blind bias. Communists and capitalists can all unite against racial injustice. If you can't except that, join the ranks of those who hide behind anti-Communism as a justification for resource exploitation and racism. South Africa, El Salvador and Palestine are not Eastern Europe or the Soviet Empire. Our people will freely choose whatever leaders they like, and reject complete eradication of apartheid.

George Bush is waiting for the Afrikaners to make a couple of symbolic gestures, before he joins the ignoble ranks of Britain's Margaret Thatcher, who lifted sanctions faster than you could pronounce her name. Maybe George could teach the Afrikaners a trick or two. Inner-city ghettoes can be created without the need for controversial apartheid laws.

On Tuesday, Sept. 6, 1977, in Police room 619, Bantu Stephen Biko was murdered, along with a small part of every black South African. The memory of Biko rose in the streets of Soweto, Athlone and Langa, and his thoughts live on in Black Consciousness. When Nelson Mandela stepped out of prison, a spark was rekindled across the nation.

We come from places as far apart as Cape Town and Calcutta to salute the heroes of South Africa. Amandla! Ngawethu !

Sri Lanka: an island in torment

By NAZEEM MUHAJARINE and JIM MATSON
Collegian Correspondents

Sri Lanka, the verdant West Virginia-sized island off the southern coast of India blessed with idyllic beaches and breathtaking natural beauty is the deadliest place on earth. According to The Economist (10/7/89;38, London) the death toll from the brutal civil war has escalated since the summer of 1989, far outstripping in deaths per 100,000, the better known battlegrounds of Beruit or San Salvador.

On Feb. 14, U.S. peace activist George Lakey, who recently returned from several months in Sri Lanka providing nonviolent accompaniment for threatened human rights activists, spoke on the current crisis and the prospects for non-violent solutions, in Memorial Hall at University of Massachsetts, Amherst. Lakey's talk was sponsored by the Sri Lanka Support Group, founded last November following a well-attended teach-in on the Sri Lanka situation at Mount Holyoke College.

News Analysis

The Sri Lankan tragedy stemmed, initially, from a separatist insurgency, which sought greater autonomy or independence for the ethnic Tamil minority that was concentrated in the north and east of the island, from the dominant Sinhalese majority.

In 1987, the Indian government attempted to intervene in the conflict between the most intransigent Tamil guerilla group, the Tamil Tigers, and the Sri Lankan army. It signed an accord with the Sri Lankan government which effectively allocated the preservation of law and order in the north and east to a 100,000 man Indian Peace Keeping Force (IPKF).

However, the presence of these foreign troops on Sri Lankan soil led to a rapid falling-out between the Tigers and the IPKF, resulting in pitched battles between them. This conflict in the north, fueled the rise of a militant group called the Janatha Vimukti Peramuna (JVP or People's Liberation Front) among the Sinhalese majority of the south.

The recent escalation in the death toll of the past six months is the result of intra-communal violence: bitter fighting within the Sinhalese community between JVP and the Sri Lankan army in the south, as well as a struggle between competing armed Tamil organizations, in the wake of a phased withdrawal of Indian forces in the north. But this intra-ethnic violence may prove to be only a short-lived chapter in a longer inter-communal conflict.

Peace Brigades International (PBI), at the invitation of the Sri Lankan Bar Association, placed a team of volunteer "escorts" for Sri Lankan human rights workers, specifically attorneys whose lives are at risk due to their legal efforts on behalf of detained or disappeared persons. The death of six Sri Lankan lawyers in early Oct. prompted the request for assistance from PBI.

PBI's Sri Lankan campaign builds on six years of experience in Guatemala, and two years in El Salvador, accompanying threatened activists working for human rights and social change. According to the PBI information on their team in Sri Lanka, "reluctance to have human rights violations come to the attention of the outside world makes the presence of the unarmed escorts a powerful deterrent to violence. So far, no one in Central America [or Sri Lanka] has been killed while accompanied by a PBI volunteer."

For those more interested in these programs, the Sri Lanka Support Group can be reached at 538-9146.

East Germans stock food

EAST BERLIN (AP) — East German Premier Hans Modrow today appealed to his countrymen not to hoard food, following an announcement that authorities plan to lift food subsidies.

Meanwhile, a joint commission led by Cabinet ministers of the two Germanys met today for the first time for talks on monetary and economic union between the two states, a major step on the road to reunification.

Modrow told Parliament that he had heard East Germans were making runs on stores to stock up on cheap food before the subsidies are lifted and the prices go up.

"I ask every citizen to show restraint and not to buy beyond normal needs," he said.

On Monday, representatives of 16 organizations, including the Communist-led government, the pro-democracy parties and labor unions, agreed to abolish state food subsidies before the March 18 free elections.

The 30 billion East German marks — $5.8 billion — freed from the state budget is to be spent on monthly payments of 150 marks, about $29, to each East German citizen to compensate for higher food prices and improve living standards.

The subsidies are being lifted in part to stop a run by West Germans on cheaper food across the border, and to put prices in line with the cost of production.

Modrow did not specify which areas of East Germany were suffering from panic food-buying, and no unusual crowding was noticed at East Berlin stores.

The Communist premier appealed to East Germans to stay home, saying that the elections will lay the foundations for a historic step — German Unity.

Modrow also urged East Germans to keep their money in the banks. East Germans, worried about their savings becoming worthless under a monetary union with West Germany, have been withdrawing their funds from banks.

He repeated his rejection of a monetary union before the election and again urged the West German government to approve massive immediate aid for the struggling East German economy.

In Bonn, West German Chancellor Helmut Kohn met with industrial leaders to discuss German economic cooperation. He said there would be no bailout unless East Germany adopts wide reforms to encourage private investment, including accepting the West German mark as the official currency.

A monetary union would replace the non-convertible East German mark with the mighty West German mark, which leaders in both states hope will stem the daily exodus of 2,000 East Germans to their rich neighbor. An immediate agreement is unlikely.

BU student shot by enraged motorist

BOSTON (AP) — Police continued to investigate the shooting of a Boston University student Tuesday, as he remained in intensive care after being shot by a motorist who was angered when one of the student's friends tried to jump over the hood of a car, police said.

Leslie J. Young, 20, a junior engineering student from Fairless hills, Pa., remained in the intensive care unit at Beth Israel Hospital, where he underwent seven hours of surgery Monday.

Young was shot once in the abdomen about 2:30 a.m. Monday. The bullet entered his stomach and traveled upwards into his chest, a hospital spokeswoman said.

"Right now, it's a waiting period," said spokeswoman Lori Veno. Young's mother had visited on Tuesday morning, she said.

Police said the shooting occurred while Young and two student friends — David H. Lamberg, 22, a senior from Springfield, Pa., and Christopher Pasquini, 20, a junior from Milford, Conn. — were walking to the campus from a party.

Officers said they were told that one of the friends tried to jump over the hood of a car stopped for a traffic light at Commonwealth Avenue and Babcock Street.

One of the student's feet hit either the hood or side of the car as he came down, damaging it slightly, officials said.

Pasquini told police the man immediately got out of the car with a handgun and fired once. He then waved the gun and asked, "Does anyone want more?"

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Work pressures lessen. You are able to accomplish more than you did yesterday. Exercise patience when dealing with a parent-child relationship. Set a good example by curbing your temper.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Economic factors influence your personal plans today. You feel pressed to make a major concession to your mate or partner. Both of you will compromise if you are truly lucky in love.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Determination and a willingness to try new things mark you as someone bound to succeed. You find most everyone receptive to your ideas. With careful handling, a flickering romance could flare up again.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Take advantage of any opportunity to better your financial status. Do not treat family members' cares lightly. Show that you are truly concerned about their welfare. Your creative talents find new outlets.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): You are not the only person with strong feelings and desires. Neglect those close to you and you might lose them. Friends and relatives call and visit. Romance is happier the second time around.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): You can carry out your plans now without making too large a dent in your budget. Take advantage of a special financial opportunity. Move forward with confidence where romance is concerned.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Look forward to accomplishing a lot at work today. Pay special attention to a newcomer's needs and you will make a good friend. Your instincts are excellent. Trust your intuition in a romantic situation.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Plan ahead and success will come more easily. An old strategy needs revising. Welcome new responsibilities. Social events are more satisfying than routine romance. Keep entertainment costs down.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Put your thoughts on paper before presenting them to an authority figure. Double-check all facts and figures. The chances for career advancement are splendid. Play a waiting game.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Spiritual growth is accented. Follow your own brand of practical wisdom when putting your personal affairs in order. You will profit by investing in commercial real estate.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Your financial situation shows improvement, thanks to both good luck and hard work. Your ambitions take a new turn. You could learn a lot from teaching. Avoid fretting if your evening plans fall through.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Get busy and make some positive changes in your life. Keep your ears and eyes open and your career could get a shot in the arm. Emotions you thought long-forgotten are reawakened.

Some of the team will be provisionally entered into the New England Championships. A provisional entrance is requested for participants who failed to qualify in regular season meets but whose personal records meet or exceed standards set by the New England conference.

Provisionally entered runners include Maureen Meldrim in the 1500-meter, Laura LaVallee in the 3000-meter and Sue McFayden in the 55-meter dash. Meldrim ran a 4:47.50, missing the NE standard by 16-hundreths of a second. LaVallee, trying to recover from mononucleosis, missed qualifying by 4.02 seconds.

"The team looked sharp," said LaFreniere. "We're right where we want to be."

ski teams finish regular season

Three runs were held on Sunday, the first run being the conclusion of Saturday's race. The University of Massachusetts varsity teams were hardly affected by the unusual situation as both the men and women took third place.

Marci Blacker (fourth) set the pace for the Minutewomen. She was aided by strong performances from Marti Gilbert (12th) and Jen Egan (13th).

Sophomore Chuck Holcomb was the flare that the men needed by grabbing second place. His supporters were John Roche (10th), Mike Hannigan (13th), Pete Sulkowitz (19th) and Matt Griffin (22nd).

Immediately following that run, the second giant slalom of the weekend was underway. Both UMass teams were again third behind BC and Plymouth State, respectively.

Holcomb had another fantastic race with a third place finish. Roche (12th), Sulkowitz (18th), Paul Robinson (19th) and Josh Cohen (21st) also scored for UMass.

Blacker was again fourth for the women. Other solid performances were from Egan (sixth), Mary Sinton (10th) and Gilbert (13th).

Minutemen work OT to beat Rhody

don and the rest of his teammates had reason to be intimidated. Green is the nation's leading shot-blocker averaging close to five a game. Green finished with five blocks but the Minutemen did not seem complacent at taking the ball to the hole. In fact, that is where most of the offense was last night. The Minutemen stayed away from the outside shot for most of the game. Point guard Cary Herer hit the only three-point shot of the night for UMass. And that was just the second trey of the year that Herer has nailed.

After a UMass timeout with eight seconds left in regulation, and everyone in the building thinking the ball was going to McCoy, Herer (eight assists) inbounded the ball to Herndon on the right side. Herndon drove right past Green and layed the ball in to knot things up, 64 apiece with five seconds left.

Ther Rams failed on their next attempt, sending the game into the extra periods.

From there, McCoy scored six points in overtime and Herndon five as the Minutemen picked up a badly needed A-10 victory.

UMass got a tough break in between the first and second OT's when the officials called a technical on Calipari for arguing a call. Leslie hit just one of the techs though and the Minutemen this time were not the victims of any fluke.

Red Sox GM stresses need for spring training

Gorman still searching for fourth starter

WINTER HAVEN, Fla., (AP) — General Manager Lou Gorman of the Boston Red Sox said yesterday at least 3½ weeks of training will be needed to prepare major league clubs for the regular seasons.

"I don't think you can start a season without giving the pitchers at least 3½ weeks," Gorman said after opening his office at empty Chain O'Lakes Park on the sixth day of baseball's spring training lockout.

"You might be able to get by with a shorter period, but you wouldn't want to put pitchers out there unless you were sure they were in shape," Gorman said. "You want to be sure before you send a pitcher into the championship season."

Gorman said he disagreed with critics who think the training season, usually about six weeks for pitchers and catchers, is too long.

"Some people think spring training is a waste of time," he said. "I don't. I think spring training is important. I think playing in the games is important.

"It's okay to work out and get into shape, but it's the competitiveness pitching against live hitting, and hitters facing live pitching."

Gorman said that in addition to getting players into shape to lessen the risk of injury, spring training and the exhibition games are important for players, young and old, bidding for one of 24 spots on a major league roster.

"You bring in a Shane Rawley or a Carlos Quintana or a Joe Johnson or any extra guys and if you lose time you don't get a chance to look at them," he said. "You might miss a young kid or an older player who could surprise you because they might not get a chance to make the club."

He added:

"You have to have some kind of spring training. How much that will be, or how many days that will be, will have to be decided."

Gorman flew to Winter Haven although the ballpark is off limits to players who want to work out while club owners and the Players Association try to reach an agreement in their labor dispute.

"In a conference call, general managers were told to go to spring training camps if they wanted to," Gorman said. "I decided why stay up there in Boston in snow and ice when I could be down here in the sun.

"I can work just as easily out of an office here as I can up there. As long as there's a telephone, I can work."

Gorman said he is continuing a hunt for a fourth starting pitcher to go with Roger Clemens, Mike Boddicker and John Dopson.

"I'm sure we can get one," he said. "I've talked to three clubs about some pitching [recently], but I couldn't get what I wanted. I could get some prospect, but I don't want that. I want someone who can help us now, this year. If we can get one more starting pitcher, we'll be fine."

By GEORGE AUSTIN

All you had to do was look at John Calipari's hair to tell what kind of game the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team had been through last night at the Curry Hicks Cage.

After watching his Minutemen go through two overtimes before finally subduing Rhode Island, 77-74 for a big Atlantic 10 victory, all the hairs on the head of the UMass coach were clearly not in place.

It wasn't until the final shot clanged off the rim and the buzzer sounded that Calipari could breathe easily. After a couple of Jim McCoy free throws had put UMass up 77-74 with four seconds left, URI's Jeff Kent lofted a pass up floor where guard Eric Leslie was waiting.

Leslie was on the left side of the court a couple of feet in back of three-point land where he launched a shot that caromed off the back of the rim and out. But the way the Minutemen's luck has been going this year, it's almost a wonder that the shot didn't go in.

"When Leslie took that shot, I picked up the clipboard and was ready for a third overtime," Calipari said.

UMass lost in three overtimes last weekend to Temple at the Cage. The Minutemen have been the victim of some wild finishes on more than a few occasions throughout the season. It was about time that Calipari's crew finally picked up the "W."

"If anybody deserved to win a close game, it was this team," Calipari said.

And thank you William Herndon for keeping the Minutemen in the game throughout. In what was probably the sloppiest game played at the Cage in quite some time (45 turnovers between the teams), forward Herndon kept UMass close the whole way, scoring 27 points on 11-of-15 shooting from the field.

It was not until McCoy (26 points) knocked down a free throw to put UMass up 67-66 with 4:09 left to play in the first OT that UMass was able to grab a lead. The Rams had led by as many as 11 in the second half and threatened to put the game out of reach if it was not for some tough buckets made by McCoy and Herndon.

UMass took the lead for good in the game when Herndon hit a couple of freebies from the line with 30 seconds left in the contest after he had been fouled by Kenny Green.

"Herndon has carried us for three games, on his back," Calipari said. "He has just carried us."

With center Green standing in the paint all night, Hern-

Lockout won't hurt baseball

Picture this scene if you will. A bright, sunny, warm . . . no make that hot, very hot, in a small Florida town called Winter Haven.

Canseco fouls off yet another one.

"Boy these two have been at it for a while," says Boston Red Sox manager Joe Morgan.

Boston's new stopper, and UMass alum, Jeff Reardon winds up for the payoff pitch.

Canseco swings . . . It's a deep fly to left-center. It's going . . . going . . .

C.J. Abati

Okay, so Reardon lost that time. Don't worry about it. It was only a simulated game in spring training to get the boys of summer ready.

Any other year, everyone would have bought that explanation. Any other year — not this one.

Last week, major league pitchers and catchers were supposed, repeat, supposed to report to camp, but they can't. The owners locked them out. Today, Chain O'Lakes park sits in a sea of dreary emptiness. If this holds out, Fenway Park could look just the same come April.

The reason is simple. It is a silly, childish, greedy fight. It all comes down to dollars and cents. Major League Baseball is one of the largest money-making businesses in America. The players merely want a larger piece of the pie, and the owners won't give it to them.

Baseball is presently without a collective bargining agreement, so in order to avoid a strike during the season, the owners locked the players out of spring training. I don't know about you, but it all looks the same to me . . . no baseball.

The owners want to shake things up just a bit. They want to start a pay-per-performance system where next year's contract is based on last year's stats. This would hurt players like Rob Murphy, who didn't have good stats, but had a great year as a set-up man. The owners want to put a salary cap on free agency and do away with arbitration. Multi-year contracts for players without six full years of service will be eliminated.

The players don't exactly like the owners' ideas, and have a few demands of their own. They want a 40 percent increase for players who earn the minimum salary. Which, by the way, is $68,000. The players also want eligibility for salary arbitration reduced from three years service to two years. Lastly, they want protection against owners' collusion, which has happened on several occaisions in the past.

Like I said before, it all comes down to money.

Can baseball survive yet another tiresome ordeal in less than a year? Definitely, it's America's pastime. If the sport can live through the Pete Rose scandal and the Wade Boggs affair, I think it can survive a little thing like a lockout.

Will the game be as popular when it returns? If history repeats itself, and it usually does, yes, it will be as popular as ever. Fans came out in droves after the players went on strike for 53 days in 1981. On opening day last season, after the torrid Penthouse article, fans gave Wade Boggs a standing ovation. An unbelievable act from a city that wanted to lynch him a month earlier. Yes, baseball will be popular in 1990.

Both the owners and the players need to get their act together. Both sides have some good arguments, but not too many. Both sides are making millions and millions of dollars from a game children play for free.

The only thing to say is, "Let's play some ball."

Women gymnasts host Huskies

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Starting off the more difficult portion of its season with a tremendous but narrow victory over New Hampshire, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team cannot let its guard down if they want to emerge victorious yet again tonight, taking on Northeastern Univerity at Boyden Gym (7 p.m.).

The Minutewomen will look to improve upon their 7-2 record, not putting a knot in their string of seven consecutive victories. The Huskies (12-0), coming in off their victory Sunday over Cornell University, will not make this an easy task since they have beaten the Minutewomen every time the two teams have met beginning in 1982.

"Northeastern is no pushover. We can't sneak up on Northeastern like we did to UNH," said coach Alfie Mitchell. "They'll beat us easily if we don't perform."

The Huskies' top two all-arounders, Rochell Perry and Kathy McCarthy, will keep the Minutewomen on their toes, forcing them to constantly watch the scoring in each event. Gymnast-of-the-week in early January, Perry, scored a 9.65 on the floor exercise this season, the highest score ever in NU history.

Mitchell knows the Minutewomen must score in the 180s again, which he feels confident his team will do. Only scoring a 42.85 on the uneven bars on Saturday, Mitchell still plans to go with the same rotation. Changes might be made on the beam where the Minutewomen counted two falls, losing what might have been a costly point against UNH.

"We need a good bar day. If we hit all our events, we'll score 183 or 184," Mitchell said. "We need to perform in meets like we do in practice."

With a day off from practice, the Minutewomen hope not to lose their edge in preparing for NU.

"We only had two practices and I wasn't sure on Monday how the girls felt about this meet,"Mitchell said.

The Minutewomen need to keep scoring in the 180s in order to erase some of their lower scores from earlier meets. Currently ranked fourth in the Northeast, Mitchell knows his gymnasts must remain consistent to keep pace with the other top Northeast teams.

"After these next three weeks, we'll know how we stand," Mitchell said.

Skiers close campaign in third place

By RICK D'ELIA
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst College was the host to a bizarre weekend of ski racing at Berkshire East in Charlemont.

These races marked the end of the National Collegiate Ski Association's Eastern Division season. Both University of Massachusetts ski teams wound up in third place, trailing Boston College and Plymouth State, in that order.

A treacherous 60-mph wind forced the chair lifts to close on Saturday morning. However, the race officials decided to proceed with the first run of the giant slalom, provided that the racers hike the course. After the run was completed, the officials elected to postpone the second run until Sunday because the wind was too detrimental.

More NE qualifiers for women's track

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's indoor track team wrapped up their regular season Saturday at Smith College's "Last Chance" Invitational.

Competition was strong, encouraging the women to qualify or come close to qualifying for next week's New England Championships.

The non-scoring meet showed some promising times for the Minutewomen, including the distance medley relay (12:12.99). Becky Johnson led off with the 1200-meter (3:45), followed by LeeAnn Ambrose in the 400-meter (57.2) and rounded up by co-captains Julie Muccini in the 800-meter (2:22.5) and Shana Smith in the 1600-meter (5:08).

"We lapped Springfield College twice in the relay," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "Overall, there were very few disappointments."

Bringing in first and a qualifying time to boot, Lennice Johnson took the 600-yard (1:29.22). Becky Johnson placed second with a time of 1:29.65 and Cathy Crocker finished fourth with 1:30.76 in the same event.

Tina White, a consistent shot-putter, placed second and qualified for NEs with a distance of 44-4. White is still recovering from a streptococcus infection of the throat acquired last week.

Women's Center reopens

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

After being defunct for several semesters due to lack of student interest and participation, the Women's Center in the Van Meter residence hall at the University of Massachusetts reopened last night.

According to Carol McMaster, a resident assistant and assistant coordinator of the Center, the funding for the Center always existed but the support from the community was not there.

"People just weren't interested," McMaster said.

Elisa Fadum, a resident assistant of Butterfield, is the coordinator of the Center's 12-person staff of RAs and activists. "The dorms are where outreach is needed and being inside allows me to pick up directly what resources are needed," Fadum said.

Fadum said she hopes the Center will to provide an increased awareness around issues concerning all women on and off-campus and a safe environment for men and women to learn and experience these issues.

Sally Majewski, the student development coordinator, helps the Center with funding and program ideas.

Majewski said the Center is a place where women can learn to become comfortable with their differences and respect the beauty of those differences.

In the ten years that Charri Boykin-East has worked at UMass, she said she has seen the Center close and open several times.

"It is nice to see Van Meter be once again a place that people feel comfortable and can gather," said Boykin. "This is a place to come and network, grow and learn about oneself, and men, and learn more about one's sexuality."

Boykin-East, the resident director of Van Meter/Butterfield Cluster, is the administrative liason who works with the women in the center.

Scott Dworkin, a Van Meter RA, said: "This is a good place to address women's issues. For example, if the funding of the Escort Service is cut off, women could address that here."

Dworkin said a good way for women to liberate themselves and overcome oppression is to come together and empower themselves.

Fadum added, "As for the future, I want to have a place that works with issues of oppression, health issues such as eating disorders, issues of sexism, and things that aren't really discussed because they are too personal."

The Center offers such resources as a library of over 150 books, weekly programs including workshops, speakers, discussions and support groups.

The Center will be open 66 hours a week. People who are interested in volunteering their time should contact Elisa Fadum at 546-9295. The Center is co-sponsoring an Angela Davis video called "The Myth of the Black Rapist" Thursday, Feb. 22, at 7 p.m.

Peters: success is possible

Speaker urges minorities to break into inner power structure

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

Minority employees seeking growth within an organization must break into the inner power structure, rather than remain on the outside, said Dr. Donald C. Peters, University of Minnesota Health Services Coordinator yesterday in the Campus Center.

"The people who make decisions have to know you exist," Peters said in a speech to 15 people.

The speech, entitled "Strategies for Growth in a Predominantly White Environment for Staff of Color," addressed problems minorities face in breaking into upper level positions.

Peters said, since minorities frequently do not feel welcome in the White power structure of an organization, they too often remain on the outside, just taking their checks and going home.

Peters, who has been in the position of both employer and job-seeker, said he is familiar with the problems faced by minorities within organizations.

"What happens with minorities is we consistently do our work well, but no one notices, and we get taken for granted," he said. "We have to get in with the people in control, and this is often more difficult for people who come from a different culture."

Minorities must learn to sell themselves and their abilities, and even emphasize their minority status, he said.

"As minorities, we confront problems that the majority population doesn't." Peters said. "Because of this, we develop skills that other people don't have, and if you make people aware of these skills, it can help you get the job."

Once in the organization, people of color must be highly visible, he said. They must make sure the boss knows who they are and that they have something to contribute, because White employers tend to let minorities settle into positions and remain there, Peters said.

He said although many people may see this as giving-in to an unfair system, being inside the power structure is the best way to help other minorities.

Peters worked at University of Massachusetts Health Services from 1983 to 1988, when he left to work for the University of Minnesota. He has given similar talks at universities across the country.

Greek Area women learn self-respect and self-defense

By LINDSAY HOADLEY
Collegian Staff

Stacy Roth is posed, fists clenched at hip-level, within a circle of women who stand imitating her stance. "Think of something you really don't like, something you want to say 'no' to," she commands, "and we're going to punch and we're going to yell, 'NO!'"

The group obeys for five punches into mid-air and, amongst giggles of embarrassment, they follow Roth's instruction to give themselves a round of applause. "How does that feel?" Roth asks as the laughter subsides. "It feels good," one participant said in a serious tone.

Roth, educator and coordinator for the Advocates Against Violence Against Women Program at the University of Massachusetts, spoke Tuesday night at Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority as the first of two workshops for Greek Area women.

The workshops are one of many responses to the increased fear felt by Greek and non-Greek women following the murder of UMass junior Sharon Galligan last semester, she said.

"There's definitely been a big increase in safety needs and awareness, which is why we've been working so hard in the community," Roth said. "This was not an isolated incidence, violence against women happens a lot, and unfortunately what happened to Sharon was part of that violence."

Throughout the course of the workshop, Roth and her assistant, Linda, discussed how self-perception influences vulnerability to crime. According to Roth, much of how women feel about their strength determines how weak they are thought to be by an attacker.

"Ninty percent of your strength is mental," she said "It does not have as much to do with your size and your stature as what's going on in your mind."

Roth and her assistant conducted role-playing games which tested the women's reactions to unwanted attention.

In one game, the participants were instructed to react to a man, who was played by a group member, soliciting attention at a bus stop.

The women's polite and nervous responses to the imaginary solicitor proved that women tend to feel embarrassed about and therefore accept unwanted attention, Roth said.

"We're told that we as women have attitude problems if we're assertive," she said. "A lot of us have learned that being polite is more important than other things, but what we need to learn is that taking care of ourselves is our top priority.

"It's not such a bad thing to put a message out of 'Don't mess with me.' If someone bothers you, make that known," Roth said.

The workshop was one of two sponsored by Panhellenic Council.

Burns sustained in dishwasher

By LISA SHAPIRO

A 21-year-old male student at the University of Massachusetts was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by ambulance Tuesday afternoon after he received burns from hot water in a dishwasher in the Worcester Dining Common, police said yesterday.

A University employee said the student went through the dishwasher, which by state law, is required to use 180 degree Fahrenheit water for the final rinse cycle.

He said the 19-foot dishwasher is "flight type," (conveyer belt-operated). He said a person could easily go through the machine.

MIT professor sticks to research

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Phillip A. Sharp the biology professor nominated to be the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's next president, announced Tuesday that he doesn't want the job because of his commitment to research and teaching.

Sharp was nominated six days earlier by the executive committee of the MIT Corporation after more than 200 candidates had been considered, said school spokesman Kenneth D. Campbell.

"I know that the presidency of MIT is an office of extraordinary importance, challenge and opportunity — but in the end, I discovered that it is not me," said Sharp, who directs MIT's Center for Cancer Research.

"As I anticipated dissolving my research program and teaching duties, I came reluctantly to the realization that I could not fill that void in my life with anything else," Sharp said in a statement.

"I apologize for my indecisiveness and for not more fully understanding this personal need," he said.

Current President Paul E. Gray, who is leaving to become MIT Corporation chairman after 10 years at the university's helm, said the committee accepted Sharp's decision with great regret.

He said the panel was disappointed by Sharp's withdrawal, but was pleased the professor was remaining at MIT.

Sharp underwent several interviews during the committee's search to replace Gray. Gray was to become chairman of the corporation July 1, but that date may be changed, said spokesman Kenneth D. Campbell. The MIT Corporation was due to vote on Sharp's nomination at its next meeting March 2.

School official praises Mandela

BOSTON (AP) — The superintendent of Chelsea's public schools says she stands by her praise of South African opposition leader Nelson Mandela, despite complaints from Boston University's acting president that Mandela was not a fit example for eighth graders.

"I think (Mandela) is a symbol of hope and he should be honored for that," Superintendent Diana Lam said Wednesday. "We all want apartheid to end, and he represents the first possible signal that it may happen.

"He is a symbol to all of us. He belongs to everybody, like Martin Luther King, or Ghandi in India."

Lam became superintendent last year after Boston University began managing the Chelsea school system in an unprecedented educational reform effort.

In a letter to Lam, BU head John Westling took issue with her speech to eighth graders in which she praised Mandela.

"Nelson Mandela is not someone who should be held up as an heroic example of patient commitment to a good cause," wrote Westling, who is presiding over BU while John Silber is on a leave of absence to campaign for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in Massachusetts.

"Nelson Mandela could have sided with the advocates of freedom and democracy and of the non-violent abolition of apartheid. Instead, he has thrown in his lot with killers," Westling wrote.

Mandela was freed Feb. 11 after serving 27 years in jail for his role in the anti-apartheid struggle waged by the African National Congress.

Lam said she gave her speech in early February after South African president F.W. de Klerk announced plans to release the activist.

Lam said she was shocked by Westling's letter. The interchange has not influenced her views on Nelson Mandela, or his relevance as a symbol for the Chelsea students, she said.

"I stand by my words. I would be honored to have Mr. Mandela as a guest in Chelsea, or in my home," she said. "Obviously (Westling) can make his own judgement and positions . . . but so can I."

She wrote a letter to Westling explaining her stance, she said.

"Here was a timely 'teachable moment' for young adolescents who rarely view themselves as active participants in experiencing, let alone shaping, history," she wrote.

While Westling's letter applauded Lam's effort to make students "aware of the wider community" he said he was "disturbed that, in making your point, you used a misleading or perhaps sadly oversimplified example.

"The media tell a story of a movement that may have started out with a just and noble purpose but which lost its way amidst the seductions of totalitarian ideology, the pursuit of personal power, the desire for revenge and a certain element of viciousness," Westling wrote.

State slashes over 5,000 positions

BOSTON (AP) — The state government, looking to cut costs because of its fiscal crisis, has eliminated more than 5,000 positions since July 1988 at a savings of about $130 million, officials said Wednesday.

But some critics questioned whether low-level employees were bearing the brunt of the cuts while upper managers were being spared.

Daniel Sullivan, undersecretary for administration and finance said the figures released Wednesday "validate to a substantial extent" what the state has been doing to cut costs in government.

He noted that Gov. Michael Dukakis had set a goal of reducing the state's budgeted workforce by 5,000 full-time positions by June 30, when compared with employment levels of July 1, 1988.

The Dukakis administration says it has been trying to cut costs to deal with a state budget deficit, now estimated at $508 million. The Legislature has refused his plea to raise taxes.

As of Feb. 12, the state had eliminated 5,439 positions and added on 838 in "critical areas" such as corrections and human services. The difference translated to 4,601 positions off the payroll, which totaled 65,375.

But Sullivan said 405 layoff notices are currently being processed, and most should be completed by April 30. Those additional layoffs will bring the total cutback to 5,006 full-time positions.

Officials said 3,378 of those positions were eliminated through attrition, and the total cutback eliminated $130 million in annual salaries.

Among the job categories that experienced the largest cuts were clerks, which saw more than 370 positions eliminated. Also, the state cut 508 typist positions, and 271 mental health worker slots.

The state also trimmed its barber positions from 16 to 14, and cut beauticians from 16 to 14.

But state Rep. Greg Sullivan (D-Norwood) who has pushed the Dukakis administration to identify the cuts, said he was dissatisfied, because the list did not contain the names and salaries of the workers whose jobs were eliminated.

"I fear what's happening is the Indians are being fired and the chiefs are being kept on board," he said.

Rep. Frank Hynes (D-Marshfield) said "the information is so obtuse that you can't put to bed the question" of what cuts have been made.

SGA votes to back GEO work stoppage

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted last night to join the one-day boycott of classes by the Graduate Employees Organization if the administration does not recognize GEO as a union by March 1.

Renee Heberle, spokeswoman for GEO appeared before senators last night explaining the reasons behind GEO's desire for a one-day work stoppage.

"We both had reached an impasse with the negotiations. We did not get up and walk out on them," Heberle said. "We were meeting in Whitmore, and since it was not our office, we left."

She said the University was unwilling to truly empower graduate students, "They are denying any enforcement of our rights. We aren't going to sell ourselves short."

When the question was raised regarding how undergraduate advocation of the one-day work stoppage will help GEO, Heberle said, "The support of the undergraduates will show the administration we are serious. It will galvanize support behind [our] demands."

Daniel Cohen, Chair of the Academic Affairs Committee reminded the senators that graduate students had supported last semester's undergraduate strike by protesting further budget cuts.

"[Graduate student] job security is threatened at this point, they were behind us all the way," Cohen said.

Paul DelGallo, member of the Rents and Fees Committee, said the administration would not be hurt by the stoppage, rather it would be the students who suffer. If the professors continue teaching, and teaching assistants are absent from their discussion sections, the students will be missing out, DelGallo said.

"Those hurt will be the consumers, customers of this University — the students," DelGallo said.

President of the Student Government Association Traci Davis, spoke in support of the work stoppage. She said that graduate students make it possible for the University to offer large lecture session because they take on several discussion sections.

"What will happen if they walk out for good because they are not recognized?" Davis asked.

In other SGA business:

- Ken Parker was unanimously appointed by Orchard Hill Area Government as an Orchard Hill senator. A junior and UMass student since last fall, Parker said, "I am very happy to have been appointed."
- John Silveria, senator from the Greek Area government, announced his candidacy for SGA president.
- Kathy LeMay, member of the Public Policy committee also announced her candidacy for SGA president. She will run on the same ticket as Angus McQuilken, Senator from Commuter Area Government.

Voice staff urges support

By KENDRA PRATT

At the third part in the Women's Studies Brown Bag Lunch Series, three members of "The Valley Women's Voice Collective:

Women Publishing a Women's Paper" yesterday discussed their experiences with the publication and explained the political and editorial policies of the paper.

Staff members of the publication, which runs monthly and is produced by and for women at the University of Massachusetts, called for area women to help to further diversify the feminist publication with submissions, ideas and participation.

"We need outreach to be a full voice, more than just 12 people," said Henrietta Shannon, a Collective member. "Our office can be the place for you to come in and tell us what you're thinking and hearing."

Over the past year, the Collective has increased from five to 12 members this spring. New staff members include an advertiser, a bookkeeper, two photographers and a graphic artist, Shannon said.

Shannon said that at the end of last semester, for efficiency reasons, the collective split up into three groups — content, productions and office work.

"Major changes came on one year ago which were really a turning point," Shannon said. "A core of five women had been working hard to strengthen the paper so that if we left, anyone could come in and take over the office systems."

Debbie Connolly, a Collective member, works in the content part of the paper — writing and photography. Connolly has written to individual professors to encourage women to write for the publication. She suggested that professors offer credit for regular submissions to the paper.

"We're really a good place for women to submit their ideas and work for the greater community," Connolly said.

A graduate student involved with production, Peg Aloi, said the Collective members were currently trying to set up open forums with professional women in the area who are also interested in working with the publication.

Shannon said that at last Thursday's meeting of the Collective, there was a two-hour discussion in which the feminist format was almost changed to include men's submissions. However, she felt that the publication should remain strictly devoted to women's issues due to the lack of women's voices heard in mainstream media.

"Only six percent of women hold the top media slots and only 40 percent of those voices get to the front page," Shannon said. "That's just a tiny voice out there. So we need to stay women-focused."

Legal Services proposal presented to Madson

By CRAIG BERGER
Collegian Correspondent

The Legal Services Center moved one step closer to regaining authorization to represent University students in off-campus legal court cases, according to members of the Legal Services Center Governing Board and Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, who met last week to discuss limited litigation powers.

Members of the LSC presented Madson with a 50-page proposal expressing the need to boost legal services to students and meet a broader spectrum of needs. LSC members also asked to represent students in cases involving landlord-tenant relations, consumer protection, uncontested family matters and off-campus civil rights violations.

Joanne Mei, chair of the Legal Services Center, said she was encouraged by the meeting. "We accomplished a lot in one hour. Mr. Madson understands that the students need access to the legal system."

Madson said he was impressed by the proposal. "We had a very good meeting. The board was articulate and candid about their needs."

The policy will exclude litigation against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and its' agencies, including the defense of students charged with violations of criminal law," the proposal said.

"The office will neither file nor assist in the filing of any litigation against the University of Massachusetts, it's officers, officials, agencies and staff," the proposal said.

The area specific to suits against the University would be excluded from LSC's representation, according to the proposal.

The way the University allocates money for attorneys to litigate on behalf of students is a concern that must be addressed, Madson said. A possibility he sees is for students to pay for LSC representation on a voluntary-fee basis which would be at a rate much lower than non-LSC attorneys would charge.

Another option could have a University system of litigation insurance, in which students could choose to have litigation coverage for a small fee.

Since 1987, the LSC has been operating without litigation power, functioning only as a resource for information and legal consultation.

The office also is hoping to be involved with victim/witness counseling and assistance and administrative hearings involving federal, state and local governments.

Within the next few weeks, the LSC Governing Board and Madson will meet again to find a common ground for approaching the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees. The Trustees will have the ultimate decision as to whether to grant the LSC the power to litigate on behalf of students.

Religion certificate offers students new perspectives

By BRIAN PURCELL
Collegian Staff

Since the first chapters of history, religion has created and transformed society, and as field of study it provides a "frame of understanding" to interpret the modern world, said Barnett Pearce, University of Massachusetts communication department head.

Based on this philosophy, Pearce helped create a Religious Studies certificate program which is open to Five College students. The program was established in the fall of 1989, under the guidance of Pearce and sociology professor Clark Roof.

"We saw a great need for studying religion, and took some steps to address it," Pearce said.

The first step in creating the program was offering an introductory class in religion, which will be offered again next fall in the sociology department, Pearce said. Classes in other departments in the Five College area were organized to fit into the program requirements, he said.

"There's such a wealth of religious experience and expression to study," said Pearce, the program's coordinator. The course selections encompass a wide range of religious thought, he said, including but not limited to Judaism, Christianity and Eastern religions.

Six courses are needed to receive the certificate, which can also be applied to General Education requirements.

Pearce pointed out that the program is geared toward an analysis of religion, not in instruction of religious practice.

The major goal of the program is to discover the impor-

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — NASA yesterday delayed the launch of the space shuttle Atlantis' secret military mission for at least 24 hours because of the commander's ill health and weather conditions.

A brief statement said the commander, Navy Capt. John O. Creighton, had "developed an upper respiratory tract infection. In addition, the launch weather is not predicted to be favorable."

NASA said it would decide today whether to try the launch at the Kennedy Space Center on Friday.

CHARLESTON, S.C. (AP) — Great Britain's Prince Charles is calling on business leaders for a "new deal" in which capitalism is more humane.

"The crucial factor is whether such an approach can be commercial. And yet, surely, it must be good business in the long run," the Prince of Wales told about 100 corporate executives gathered for an international business conference Tuesday.

The two-day meeting of Business in the Community, a London-based group founded by the prince, brings corporate leaders together to discuss the roles and responsibilities of business.

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP) — CBS Records honored singer Michael Jackson as the label's biggest money-maker of the 1980s, when fans bought more than 110 million of his records.

"I have to say now, no album sells itself," the 31-year-old singer said at a Tuesday news conference. "It is up to the people to buy it."

In a typically truncated speech, the gloved-one thanked "all the children of the world," several record industry executives and his parents.

Jackson's output in the decade included the era's two largest-selling albums, "Bad" and "Thriller."

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) — Former talk show host Morton Downey Jr. is asking a federal bankruptcy court for protection from numerous creditors, including banks, businesses, restaurants and jewelers, according to court documents.

Downey lists liabilities of nearly $2.4 million in a petition filed Friday in U.S. Bankruptcy Court seeking protection under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy law.

Downey attorney Brian D. Spector would not comment on whether Downey's financial troubles were related to the demise of "The Morton Downey Jr. Show" which featured the host ranting and taunting guests. The program was canceled after two years.

Spector said his client, who lives in suburban Englewood, was out of town and that he would advise him not to comment.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The idled Rocky Flats weapons plant in Colorado, the sole supplier of plutonium triggers for U.S. nuclear warheads, is unlikely to resume full production until at least July, a senior Energy Department official said yesterday.

The plant, situated about 16 miles northwest of Denver, was closed indefinitely late last year for safety and management improvements.

Production of plutonium triggers is vital to maintaining the nuclear weapons stockpile. Neither the Energy Department nor the Pentagon has said how long Rocky Flats could remain out of service before the arms stockpile would be jeopardized. The plant was closed for a few months in 1988 after a worker was contaminated by radioactivity.

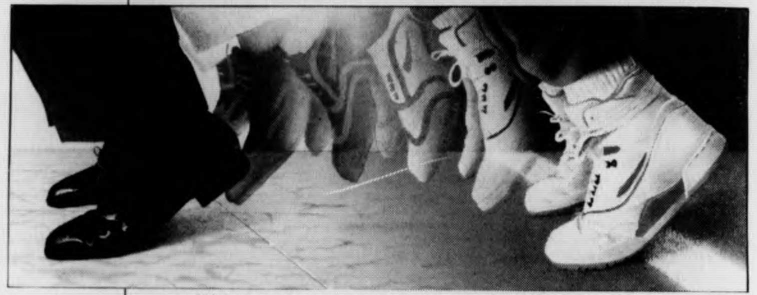
Modrow appeals for reunification

EAST BERLIN (AP) — East German Premier Hans Modrow, pressed by mass emigration and a crumbling economy, appealed Tuesday for immediate reunification talks under a formula worked out with the Allied Victors of World War II.

Helmut Kohl, the West German chancellor, urged Modrow's government to create a social security system as generous as West Germany's as a means of stopping the flight.

Kohl made a campaign trip to East Germany, lending his support to conservatives there and telling a rally of 90,000 that his government will provide aid to help the troubled country's social safety net.

The chancellor, a Christian Democrat, was repeatedly cheered by the large crowd in the city of Erfurt, who waved West German flags and shouted for quick unification.



Opportunities for Computer Science Graduates

Jump into an entry-level career that will take you places at EDS.

In an EDS developmental program, your career potential can reach new heights. You'll gain the rewarding on-the-job experience you need to move your career years ahead — experience you can only gain from a world leader in the management of information technology.

EDS is looking for achievers — people who make things happen. If you are interested in applying your talents in the information processing services industry, you won't find a better place to grow than EDS.

Our highly respected developmental programs are nationally recognized as models for the industry. They provide technical challenge, professional expertise and the business savvy you'll need to become one of the industry's best-prepared professionals.

EDS will be recruiting on campus Tuesday, February 27th for the Research Systems Engineering Development (RSED) Program.

To qualify, we ask for:
- A bachelor's degree in Computer Science with a minimum 3.5/4.0 overall GPA preferred
- Willingness to relocate to the Dallas, Texas, area
- Excellent written and oral communication skills
- Proven record of academic achievement

The RSED program instruction includes hands-on and classroom education in artificial intelligence, expert systems and advanced systems architecture. Each class uses our CASE tool, INCA, to analyze, design and build an information processing system. Students work at the EDS national headquarters in Plano, Texas. Class size is limited to 16, and students use Sun workstations and Macintosh computers for classroom instruction. Upon completion of the program, graduates are responsible for analyzing, designing, developing and building systems and tools to maintain and enhance our level of technology.

Take the first step toward achieving your highest career potential.

Students advocate a 'red Germany'

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Surrounded by posters saying, "Forward to a Leninist-Trotskyist Party in Germany" and a red wall-hanging of Nikolay Lenin, the University of Massachusetts Spartacist Youth Club Tuesday discussed Germany's political future. Johnathan Wood, one of two primary speakers at the Spartacist forum, spoke of his recent trip to East Germany. He said Germany, as well as other parts of Europe, are "in the midst of a Stalinist upheaval."

"East German workers do not want to extend capitalism," Wood said. "Despite [the fact] Stalinism has been broken, we can't build socialism in times like now. We are calling for a continuation of red Germany."

His work in Germany included campaigning for the Spartacist Group, and laying "foundations for a Leninist party."

Pam Elliott, the other main speaker, reiterated the idea that the people of Germany do not want a capitalistic society despite the West's goal of "capitalist reunification."

"They [the people] don't want to see gains won from the Nazis given over to Frankfurt bankers," Elliott said. "There is a lot of unrest. A counter-revolution stands at the door."

Elliott continued saying,"Time is running out. We are fighting to prevent the sell out of Germany and work toward a world party of social revolution."

Six members from the Minuteman demonstrated outside the forum with a vandalized Soviet flag shouting, "Death to Communism, Death to Karl Marx." They were not permitted in the forum and dispersed after the short demonstration.

The Spartacus Youth Club is part of the international Young Communist League which is "fighting for the working class," according to Lisa Martin, member of the club.

defenses through consultation with various lawyers. However, he added that they are unsure what defense they will actually chose.

"It's really hard to tell right now, much of it depends on the judge's reactions to our statements," he said.

Attorney Bill Norris of Northampton is one of the counselors who the defendants have sought advice from. He believes the four will defend themselves in a strong manner.

Norris said Allain, Leavitt, Langford and Viscio will probably draw on a quote made by a judge in "Commonwealth vs. Hood," a court decision made in 1983. It states: "If the defendant's rights to have his day in court is to be guaranteed he must be given the opportunity to establish even a tenuous defense."

Stephanie Levin, professor of law at Western New England College is another individual the four defendants have been consulting with.

Levin said she has faith in the jury system, but could not directly comment regarding advice she had given to the defendants.

Court rules child comes first in some abuse cases

BALTIMORE (AP) — The rights of endangered children sometimes outweigh an adult's right against self-incrimination, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in the case of a mother jailed for refusing to disclose her son's whereabouts.

The court ruled 7-2 Tuesday that Jacqueline Bouknight of Baltimore may continue to be jailed indefinitely for refusing to tell authorities where her 3-year-old son, Maurice, can be found.

Social service workers fear the boy is dead.

"The bottom line is the court is following an equation that says if we think it's important enough, individual rights have to give way. Here we think the rights of children, the concern for children, is important enough," said Mary Cheh, professor of constitutional law at George Washington University in Washington, D.C.

But a defense attorney said the punishment has not worked, and announced plans to file a motion in Circuit court in Baltimore seeking the immediate release of Bouknight, who has been held in a city jail since April 1988.

"Twenty-two months of incarceration has had no effect on Ms. Bouknight's position. It is against the law to keep her there. There is no reason for the court to reasonably believe that continued incarceration would do anything else," defense lawyer M. Cristina Cutierrez said.

Maurice has been missing since September 1987, when he was 11 months old.

When he was 3 months old, Maurice was admitted to a Baltimore hospital for treatment of a broken leg and other injuries. He was held temporarily in protective care.

He was returned to his mother after she agreed to undergo training in parenting skills and said she would not physically punish him.

Maurice's father was shot to death two years ago and his mother had a history of drug use, according to testimony in juvenile court. Nine months later, social workers said Bouknight was not cooperating with them. She was held in contempt by a judge after she refused to disclose Maurice's whereabouts.

The Maryland Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, ruled Dec. 19 that jailing Bouknight for refusing to disclose the information violated her constitutional protection against self-incrimination. That ruling was overturned Tuesday.

Society's interest in protecting the boy from harm prevails over the mother's claim that her right against self-incrimination will be violated if she is forced to reveal the child's whereabouts, the Supreme Court said.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote for the court that Ms. Bouknight's claim that her constitutional rights are being violated is particularly weak because of her agreement with welfare officials.

"Concern for the child's safety," O'Connor said, "underlay the efforts to gain access to and then compel production of" Bouknight's son.

But Justice Thurgood Marshall, in a dissenting opinion, accused the court of "riding roughshod" over individual rights.

Public defender George Burns Jr., who represented Bouknight, said the ruling indicated that if she were forced to disclose information on the whereabouts of the boy, the information might not be able to be used against her in a criminal proceeding.

Judge rejects lawyer's one million dollar fee

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — An attorney who saw his fee of nearly $1 million whittled down a few hundred thousand by a judge who said it was too high says he won't give up without a fight.

"We're not going to sit tight for this," said Alan R. Goodman.

"The figures are not as important as the whole system is for victims in Massachusetts."

Goodman, who will ask the state Supreme Judicial Court to review his case, maintains the decision threatens the tradition of contingency agreements, under which lawyers agree to take cases for free on condition that they get a portion of the winnings, generally one third.

Hampden County Superior Court Judge John Moriarty said in his ruling that he's not opposed to contingency fees, he merely believes that $695,000 is a handsome fee.

"Anything in excess of that amount would be unreasonable and excessive," wrote the judge, who declined comment on the matter Wednesday.

Goodman disagreed.

"Unfortunately, the situation here is it's big-city results in a small town," he said. "Just because my fee is $975,000 doesn't mean that it's unreasonable."

The case involves a $2,925,000 settlement paid to Goodman's client, Donald Gagnon, who is paraplegic because of an accident in which the driver of a garbage truck apparently feel asleep at the wheel.

Gagnon could not be reached for comment by The Associated Press yesterday, but he has testified for Goodman in hearings on the fee, saying he was happy with the settlement and had agreed to a one-third split.

"The client did not complain and is not complaining," said Goodman.

Moriarty said in his ruling that the severity of Gagnon's injuries meant a bigger settlement, and hence a larger attorney's fee.

"It is, after all, Mr. Gagnon and not Mr. Goodman who must spend the remainder of his life confined to a wheelchair," the ruling said. Applying the one-third agreement to the entire judgment would not be reasonable, the judge said. "The problem of course, lies in determining at what point a line must be drawn."

The settlement, which normally would be handled between lawyers, came under the judge's review because of workers' compensation aspects.

Moriarty approved the settlement in December, but said he wasn't prepared to let Goodman walk away with a third of the money.

Jazz books that teach about Black history

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

The history of jazz is a reflection of 20th century Black history in general, so if you read about jazz, you cannot help but learn something about Black history. As writer Playthell Benjamin said at last year's Black Musicians' Conference, "It was the music that fuelled the engines of our struggle." With this in mind, I'd like to offer some jazz-related reading suggestions for Black History Month.

The best books on jazz are the biographies and autobiographies of the musicians themselves. Many of these are fun to read, and almost all of them go beyond mere aesthetics to include the all-important historic and socio-economic factors behind the music.

Books have been written about the lives of most of jazz' major figures. Duke Ellington's autobiography, Music Is My Mistress, is great fun but long-winded and actually rather superficial — he never has an unkind word to say about anyone. James Lincoln Collier's Duke Ellington, on the other hand, is overly negative in tone. The best book on Duke is Duke Ellington In Person, a first-person account by his son Mercer.

Valley Jazz

John Coltrane is the subject of three biographies: J.C. Thomas' Chasin' the Trane, Bill Cole's Coltrane, and C.O. Simpkins' Coltrane: a Biography. I especially recommend the last-named book, a powerful work written in a style reminiscent of Amiri Baraka. Simpkins includes several poems that were inspired by particular Coltrane performances. Another worthwhile book that deals with Coltrane is Frank Kofsky's Black Nationalism and the Revolution in Music, which draws interesting parallels between the music of Trane and the politics of Malcolm X.

Miles Davis, ever controversial and charismatic, is an ideal biographical subject; next to Ellington, he is probably the most-chronicled Black musician. Bill Cole's biography is preferable to Jack Chambers' two-volume tome Milestones and Ian Carr's Miles Davis. But the best book on Miles by far is his autobiography, which came out a few months ago and was reviewed in the Collegian Nov. 9.

A.B. Spellman's Black Music: Four Lives covers the lives of Ornette Coleman and Cecil Taylor, two central figures in the revolutionary music of the 60s, as well as Herbie Nichols and Jackie McLean, both great but lesser-known musicians. The book is particularly valuable for exposing the evils of the New York nightclub and recording industries. The same is true of Valerie Wilmer's As Serious as Your Life, an excellent, in-depth look at the 1970s free jazz scene in New York.

Most jazz musicians prefer to let their music speak for itself, so it is not surprising that other jazz autobiographies deal primarily with extra-musical subjects. Charles Mingus' Beneath the Underdog is a wild, uproarious account of whores, pimps and other shady characters that often lurked behind the scenes, infinitely preferable to Brian Priestly's dry, stuffy Mingus: a Critical Biography. Art Pepper's Straight Life is a sobering, depressing tale of prison and heroin addiction.

Other worthwhile autobiographies are pianist Hampton Hawes' Raise Up Off Me and veteran bassist Milt Hinton's recent Basslines, which also includes Hinton's excellent photographs of jazz musicians.

Many of these books are available at the University Music Library in the Fine Arts Center complex.

Cunningham Dance Co. demonstrates bodily beauty

By NICOLE GONZALEZ
Collegian Correspondent
Merce Cunningham Dance Co.
Fine Arts Center
Tuesday, Feb. 20

"It's been a while since I've seen Cunningham," said a smiling audience member who waited Tuesday night to see the three dance performances by the renowned Merce Cunningham Dance Co. Although Mr. Cunningham has choreographed over a hundred works since 1953, the evening's performances, "August Pace," "Fabrications" and "Cargo X" show many controlled and conventional ideas along with strong connections with ballet.

Judging from the title of the first piece, "August Pace," it would seem as if the movements would be slow and smooth. This idea is turned upside-down as soon as the curtain opens. Three men dressed in white turtlenecks and pants "sit," bending close together, crossing their legs perpendicular to their bodies. Another man enters and leaps in random directions, turning his head and torso before each move. One of the few lasting images, made up of arching backs, sides and willowy arms, moves across the stage as soon as it is formed. Black or white numbers worn on the dancers' backs emphasize the robotic dance styles.

The background, containing random objects in a numbered list, echo the scattering movements on stage, which are somehow strung together. The music, from Michael Pugliese's "Peace Talks," is live and includes a sitar, maracas, a talking drum and a homemade rain stick. While opposing the precise mood set by the visuals, these instruments provide a more natural, outdoor setting

The word "dramatic" describes "Fabrications." Movement is slower here, and less staccato, although graceful walking and pausing is seen throughout this piece. Like "Autumn Pace," it is hard to distinguish where each of the fifteen dancers will move next. Mostly grouped in couples, there is rarely a focal point onstage, until Merce Cunningham appears.

At first, he is near the back of the stage. He looks around as if lost, shakes his arm impatiently towards the audience and moves in among the other dancers. The music, "Short Waves," by Emanuel de Melo Pimenta resembles an echoing buzz saw with the occasional flipping of radio stations.

In many ways, "Cargo X" is the lightest work of the evening. Only eight dancers perform in this piece, dressed in brightly colored unitards including, hot pink, chartreuse and purple. Yellow flowers are placed onto the sides of an antique, blue ladder off to the side. The live vocals in "Spectra" sound like temple vowels being sung under water. Still, the dancing is anchored down with it's own importance. The synchronized attitudes, plies, leaps, and pirouettes taken from ballet are bent, flexed, and twisted into Cunningham's own perplexing style. Four dancers in a diagonal line near center stage drop slowly into a parallel pile and then curve their backs and arms far forward.

Meanwhile, three other dancers, further behind, tilt themselves slightly as the ladder is pulled towards them from side to side. A woman tilts sideways until she is caught about a foot away from the floor, and then is propped back into a standing position.

In each piece, gentle, but grounded and unpredictable steps show that beauty through technique belongs not only to ballet, but to the modern dance works of Merce Cunningham.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Is Mandela really free?

The italicized quotes are from Nelson Mandela's dramatic speech after his release from 28 years of confinement in apartheid dungeons. Each quote is followed by a set of truths that we hold to be self-evident.

The factors which necessitated the armed struggle still exist today. We have no option but to continue.

Dastidar/Josias

Mandela's release signifies the triumph of the principle that Third World people will refuse to surrender the right to engage in armed struggle in self-defense, when confronted by colonialism in any form.

The reality of the South Africa into which Mandela has emerged is one of jails and torture, poverty-stricken ghettoes and Whites wallowing in the profits of slave labor.

What are the men and women of Umkhonto we Sizwe, the armed wing of the African National Congress (ANC), up against? Thousands of battle tanks, Africa's largest supersonic air fleets, carrier battle groups and a sinister arsenal of atomic weapons.

Do you really support racial equality in South Africa? Can your government live with this awesome military machine proportionately controlled by people like Tambo, Mandela and Slovo?

If not, that's ok. Send your donations to the Afrikaners. Ignore the historical reality that the violence practiced by Europeans are in terms of tons of explosives detonated, far exceeding corresponding use by people of color. The South Africans of color respect life just like any of you (hopefully) do.

I salute the South African Communist Party (SACP) for its steady contribution to the struggle for democracy . . . We are heartened by the fact that the alliance between ourselves and the party remains as strong as it always was.

The current chief of staff of the military wing of the ANC, Chris Hani, and most other top guerilla leaders, are members of the SACP. This party was racially integrated as far back as the 30s.

The October issue of the London-based African Confidential reported that 25 of the 35 members of the ANC's policy making National Executive Committee are members of the SACP. Great patriots like Govan Mbeki and Joe Slovo are all SACP members.

The ANC embraces all ideologies, and respect is based on courage and dedication, not blind bias. Communists and capitalists can all unite against racial injustice.

If you can't accept that, join the ranks of those who hide behind anti-Communism as a justification for resource exploitation and racism. South Africa, El Salvador and Palestine are not Eastern Europe or the Soviet Empire. Our people will freely choose and reject leaders as we see fit.

To lift sanctions now would be to run the risk of aborting the process towards the complete eradication of apartheid.

George Bush is waiting for the Afrikaners to make a couple of symbolic gestures, before he joins the ignoble ranks of Britain's Margaret Thatcher, who lifted sanctions faster than you could pronounce her name.

Maybe George could teach the Afrikaners a trick or two. Inner-city ghettoes can be created without the need for controversial apartheid laws.

On Tuesday, Sept. 6, 1977, in Police room 619, Bantu Stephen Biko was murdered, along with a small part of every Black South African. The memory of Biko rose in the streets of Soweto, Athlone and Langa, and his thoughts live on in Black consciousness. When Nelson Mandela stepped out of prison, a spark was rekindled across the nation.

We come from places as far apart as Cape Town and Calcutta to salute the heroes of South Africa. Amandla! Ngawethu!

Strike will only hurt students

A problem of reporting has caused Marc Kenen to describe me publicly as "classist and elitist." He correctly quotes the Collegian (Feb. 16), which reported me as saying "I can't imagine that TAs would go to such an extreme action to join up with auto workers." That would be a stupid and condescending thing to say.

What I actually said, in a telephone interview, was that I thought the TAs would recognize that the basic issues were job security and take-home pay, rather than union-joining. So, the TAs wouldn't "go to such an extreme action just to join up with the Auto Workers Union" or with any other union.

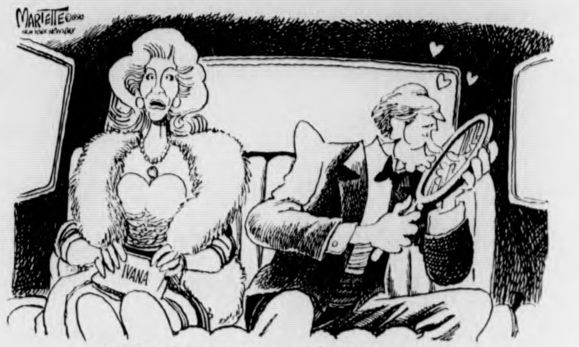
This administration works amicably with unions all the time. Perhaps the graduate employees would get benefits from such representation which justifies their dues.

The General Counsel to the University, after review with an outside law firm expert in labor law, has told us that neither the Regents, the Trustees or the campus can reverse the ten-year-old ruling of the Labor Commission saying that graduate student employees cannot unionize. The Commission itself has to do that. The campus administration can respond to other important things, and we have told GEO just that.

We have worked with them to respond to the issues of job security and fee waivers. We have also proposed a continued formal working relationship with them as an organization.

The planned one-day strike will hurt the undergraduates, but it cannot reverse the legal situation. I cannot see what it will achieve.

Richard D. O'Brien
Provost



"THERE'S SOMEONE ELSE, ISN'T THERE, DONALD?!"

Student access under fire

The issue of New Africa House has been brewing over the last two years. In 1988, students occupied the building for the second time demanding that their issues be heard. Students of color on this campus wanted the administration to take direct action toward the vision of a multicultural campus. Students and the administration agreed on most of the concerns, with promises of institutionalizing mechanisms to handle future problems.

Tracy Davis

One of the concrete agreements reached was student access to New Africa House — a unique building which houses academic support services, a cultural center and the African-American Studies Department. The fourth floor was made available to student-of-color organizations for office space. However, only half (eight rooms) of the fourth floor was made available to students. This was spring of 1988. A "space" committee was established in late spring semester of 1989 to allocate office space. This committee comprised of faculty, administrators and student representatives. And, yes, Professor Ernie Allen, of the Afro-Am Department, was a member of this committee.

Student organizations that were granted an office were told that they would receive keys to their offices in the fall semester 1989. To this date, many of those organizations have not received their keys. It is encouraging to hear that Vice Chancellor Madson is willing to take responsibility to ensure that these groups receive their keys. But this does not solve the problem of access.

Of the few organizations that have received keys to their offices, the main complaint is that of access to the fourth floor. It makes no sense to have a key to an office when you cannot enter the floor to get to the office. Prof. Allen's remarks about access to the computer lab is ridiculous. Students were not complaining about keys to the lab but accessible hours to use the lab. To have a computer lab for students open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Mondays through Thursdays and on Fridays from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. was not convenient for students, but it was for faculty members within the building. Thanks to students and Ann Quinley [Academic Support Services], the issue of computer lab hours was resolved last semester to extend hours to night usage.

But the issue of access to the building as a whole has not been addressed. The New Africa House library, located on the second floor, is closed on weekends. That location used to be a prime study location for students. But since the administration (urged by certain faculty members) believes that students cannot behave responsibly, the doors remain locked.

I'm also happy that Dr. Madson agrees with students about the need for a central governing unit of New Africa House comprising of students, staff and faculty. Prof. Allen's statement that "students [do not] have to be a part of the . . . decision-making process" is proof of his self-serving attitude. This man was a member of a committee whose charge was to determine student access and office space. It is obvious from his personal views that he should not have been (nor continue to be) a member of the committee. As a faculty member of this committee, he must have an open mind about student involvement in decisions being made for a building that students occupied (twice), a computer lab that students fought hard to get and the increase of funding for specific programs and departments that serve the interest of students and faculty of color.

Labor relations of the future

Who says that labor unions are losing popularity?

Who would dare put down labor? The working people, the blue-collar class of America, the makers and doers of the American dream?

Here on the Amherst horizon, there are new frontiers rising.

The graduate student employees, or at least 57 percent of them, want to organize a union. They want, no, demand, their right to representation. They feel mistreated by the administration.

The graduates are also suprised by the way the higher-ups are dealing with their requests.

Come on people, what did you expect? Management never treats workers with honesty, love and care. The head honchos of this world are concerned with making money, or at least keeping the business afloat long enough to squeeze every penny out of it for themselves. They are not concerned with the average worker on the street, who just barely makes the mortgage payments.

So, where have the graduate students been for the last five or six years? In school, with their noses in books, like me, not really paying attention closely to anything but their grade point averages.

And why are we in school? So maybe, just maybe, when we dream of the penthouse office, the private secretary, the limousine and the summer home on the Cape, we can have them someday.

Let's face it. Most of us want the job at the top. The perks of power, the key to the executive washroom, whatever you want to call it. And most union members won't be found in the next stall.

Gayle Long

Labor unions are a smart move. They are a cornerstone in the labor machinery of America. They protect the workers, and future generations of workers. My father is a union member. My grandfather was a union member, and I too, am proud to be a union member. Respect for the workers should be of primary importance of every company and corporation. But labor unions should not be used as a matter of convenience.

I thoroughly agree that workers have the right to organize and demand their rights. The graduate employees also have that right. But what I am concerned about, however, is the future.

Where will these graduate students be in five years? Chances are, they will be someone's boss. When this is the case, I pray that they do not forget the way they felt degraded by the administration. Because it is people with the Masters and Doctorate degrees, like our distinguished Chancellor and Provost, who start the fight with the workers.

Remember the NYNEX strike? I do. I was there, as was my family. I know the crummy things that management does to try to crush the spirit and morale of the working class. And when the strike was over, the workers were still bitter, still trying to come to grips with the reality that they were not valued highly enough by their employers to strike a bargain. The strike proved that they would not be crushed by a large corporation, but they were denied the one thing they wanted: the right to work.

The graduate employees do deserve their right to a negotiated contract. That much is certain. But in the long run, they had better not act as though the unions are plagues which must be destroyed, or that they were once union members, an ugly family secret.

Because it is through this that they form the future for the workers of America.

Remember always that workers never forget. The telephone workers won't forget how they were treated in August, so do not forget how you are being treated now.

To be rigid in the generation of Dirty Dancing

I can't dance.

When I'm alone in my room with the door shut (and locked) I am Mikhail Baryshnikov or Nureyev or any other name I can't pronounce.

But when I'm in public . . . I can't dance.

Why is this the slightest bit significant? Why do I choose to bare my soul naked before you and share this closet skeleton?

Well, I have reached a juncture in my existence. A plateau of self-awareness, if you will. A pinnacle of monumental personal achievement

I have been cast in A Chorus Line.

Should be the happiest moment of my minuscule showbiz career, eh? Well, it is and it's not. Sure, it gives me something to do five nights a week besides wander up and down my hallway waiting to perform crisis intervention. But now I am trembling in fear, hoping that nobody finds out the evil truth.

I am not a dancer.

I first realized that I couldn't dance during the glorious age of disco. Sure I could hold my own doing the Hustle and the Travolta finger-pointing thrust. But so could the local senior citizens. That proved nothing.

Then I grew up and all that Dirty Dancing stuff became the in thing. I thought I had been dirty dancing all along. It was more like sloppy dancing now that I think about it.

Josh Galitsky

Anyway, I was astonished to get a callback. I thought that maybe my name on the list was a typo. I've never seen my name spelled correctly and this time it was. I knew it had to be me. There is no other Galitsky family in the Western Hemisphere. Besides, I knew my dad hadn't tried out for the show.

I got a part and my secret is rising to the surface. I used to be able to get by on the fact that my license picture looked like Denny Terrio from Dance Fever. Not anymore. I got a new picture. It doesn't even look like Adrian Zmed.

There is so much talent in this cast, I am awestruck. It's like being at the Fame school and I'm playing the part of the Principal. Better yet . . . Danny Armatullo. He couldn't dance either.

The first thing I learned quickly from this show is that I am not flexible. I figure if you're not going to be big and muscular you might as well be flexible. I am neither.

Perhaps I could move like Prince if I didn't have these two steel poles stuck up each leg. Whenever I try to leap, my legs feel like petrified wood.

And everything hurts. It hurts when I even talk about stretching, let alone complete the action. It took me weeks just to bend into a pair of sweats.

We're learning some incredible routines in the show and I'm learning a lot about humility.

Our first lesson was a high-speed jazz routine. The first time I did it was without socks and my toes lit into flames. But then I got special, private tutoring and then I could do the routine in super-slow motion. Then my teacher added something.

"What," I wept, "you want me to do this to music?"

Then came the tap dance number. Mv performance? Imagine Snuffulufugus in the Ice Capades. That's how light I was on my feet. I needed to be lowered in on a crane to soften my step.

Everyone seemed to pick up the tap number quite easily. They all had no trouble concentrating on the combinations. I must have been thinking hard on the tuna sandwich I ate for lunch.

I probably don't understand dancing much because I don't understand the terms either. When the director was shouting "dance out" I left the room and started dancing in the hallway. And a plis ais? Forget it. I got a C/D in French.

Okay, so I give new meaning to the word Footloose. Maybe Paula Abdul won't want me in her next video. And maybe I don't even know where the Rhythm Nation is. Big deal. If New Kids can make billions on MTV doing those lame moves, then I can point my toes and be a dancer. But maybe they're just great singers.

Hmm, I didn't even mention my singing . . .

Private contractors cause union tensions

I want someone to explain it to me. We're in the middle of a state budget crisis. We see it in our tuition hikes, our fee increases, the watered-down quality of our education.

We're angry, and we have a right to be.

Well, the workers of this state are just as angry. Construction has slowed. Jobs in the building trades are few, and far between.

Able-bodied men and women, who have spent years learning their craft through approved union apprenticeship programs, sit idly by . . . waiting for work.

So why, in the midst of these economic hard times, is the state awarding its construction projects to out-of-state companies?

I'm referring to the engineering building being built on campus. The general contract was awarded to Fontaine Brothers, Inc., out of Delaware.

They, in turn, awarded the steel erection subcontract to Welding Jobs Unlimited, a Rhode Island company.

Welding Jobs Unlimited employs non-Massachusetts residents. And, since the company is non-union, its workers aren't required to complete the three-year apprenticeship program designed by the International Association of Iron Workers.

Paul Costello

So, not only has the state managed to send a sizeable amount of its revenue to Rhode Island, but it is forced to pay for inferior steel work performed by people who are not professional iron workers.

In the meantime, more than half of the members of Springfield Iron Workers Local 357 remain out of work. They try to make ends meet on their Massachusetts unemployment compensation.

Anyone connected with the University or the State House, involved in the awarding of construction contracts on campus, should be embarrassed at the spectacle of Massachusetts iron workers standing in unemployment lines, while steel erectors from Rhode Island draw their salaries from the state payroll.

The Rhode Island subcontract is a slap in the face to each and everyone of those unemployed Springfield workers. If the citizens of the Commonwealth can't depend on the State House to fight for their jobs, where can we turn?

This isn't a game. These Springfield iron workers are having trouble putting food on the table for their families.

Iron workers from Springfield Local 357 will be picketing the on-going construction at the engineering building and handing out leaflets for the next several weeks.

Stop by the job site, and show them your support. Help them to defend their livelihoods. The state has an obligation to take care of its own citizens.

Now is not the time to award state construction projects to poorly trained, out-of-state workers, while Massachusetts union professionals in the building trades face increasing unemployment.

Mending male misconceptions

In response to Gayle Long's article ("Sexist flesh, not sexual fantasy," Feb. 15), we would like to clear up some misconceptions about the male gender and society in general.

There is nothing wrong with admiring beautiful people. Men and women alike engage in this practice. Sexuality is a part of human nature.

Admiring someone's beauty in no way implies that he or she is lacking in other qualities. Whether it is in poor taste or not, Sports Illustrated, as well as many other more graphic magazines have made the decision to exploit this part of human nature.

However, this decision in no way reflects the view of the entire male gender nor does it in any way imply that men do more than fantasize about these women. It certainly doesn't imply that men see women as inferior and good only for sex.

We resent the fact that you would think men so shallow when most of us have never done anything to merit such a cruel label.

We admire and respect the idea behind the feminist movement. Women are equal to men and deserve nothing less than respect. Almost all men are willing to admit to their previous mistakes regarding the role of women in society.

There is no justification for sexism or oppression. That includes oppression of women by men and vice versa. We feel like the men of this generation are being punished for a crime committed by generations before us.

We are with you, not against you. Give us the chance to prove ourselves. We are sure that you will find that most of us are caring individuals who are really only concerned about the beautiful internal qualities found in women, even if we can be distracted by a pretty face.

Whitmore is calling

Last semester the UMass undergraduates led a week-long strike to protest the unacceptable deprioritization of education.

We were supported in this strike by many campus groups, one of the most supportive of which was the Graduate Employee Organization. Now is our time to help pay them back.

The University continues to play games with the power that they hold. They play the role of the benevolent dictator when it is in their benefit, and then turn into power-hungry, malicious administrators when their power base is threatened.

It is now time for us to realize their true colors and to act appropriately.

On March 1 undergraduates can come together, not just to support the GEO work stoppage, but also to march into Whitmore and reclaim this University for all students.

Your time spent here at the University cannot be spent in a vacuum. You have got to look around you once in a while and see where this University is headed. One way which it isn't headed is toward a more democratic campus, where the input of all is welcome and necessary.

For those of you who have never been politically involved, we understand that you are a bit hesitant. Fear is the most prevalent emotion when trying to enact change.

But remember that you will not be isolated. You will be part of a movement, and the collective power of all those involved will be there to support you.

The time is now and Whitmore is calling.

The missing facts

There is some factual information missing from your recent articles on New Africa House. Since October 1989 students have had access to their organization's offices on the fourth floor of New Africa House during a time period which overlaps normal University working hours and those hours during which the Banneker Microcomputer Learning facility is open.

The hours are 9 a.m. to 10 p.m., Monday through Friday, and 2 p.m. to 10 p.m., Sunday. If, during the above times, the fourth floor stairwell door is closed, students may gain access to their offices by contacting secretaries in the Afro-American Studies Department office, Room 325 New Africa House.

The door is locked each night by the custodial staff. If someone has not yet arrived in the morning to open it, students may occasionally require assistance in gaining access to their offices.

No one on this campus wishes to keep students out of their offices. To the contrary, the over-arching desire is to insure that the computer equipment on which students have come to depend for their academic work, remain inside the facility.

Recently Academic Support Services made a request to the Department of Afro-American Studies for a key to the fourth floor door, which has been agreed to.

Under extenuating circumstances, this arrangement will allow a student to secure access to his or her office and contact D.A.S.S. in order to gain entry. Secondly, D.A.S.S. also requested that during the hours from 2 p.m. to 10 p.m. on Sunday, when the Banneker Facility is open, that the CCEBMS Library on the second floor be made available to students for study purposes. That policy has now been implemented.

Cautious Bush not keeping pace

I just looked up the word cautious. I figured I had better get used to words synonymous with it, as President Bush will likely be in the White House for six more years. I found words like discretionary, prudent, circumspect. These are all words I'm sure the President and his spokespersons will be employing to describe any coming agenda.

Prudence is an important trait for any leader, and there have surely been times when a turtle-paced foreign policy would have kept us out of trouble.

The 1990s, though, are not that time.

Most important to America's continued success is good economic ties with the changing European community. Further, to ensure the survival of our planet, a concern for the environment and the money to turn those concerns into hard action must be found.

Almost all of Bush's proposals come packaged in a "handle with care/use only as directed" wrapper. To the public, this comes across as good policy making.

Well, that's what the public voted for so that must be what they want.

So, while the President proceeds "tentatively" on the global warming issue and tries to avoid "jumping the gun" on any peace dividends, the rest of the world is having a Democratic free-for-all.

When Bush has been bold, it has been with broad consensus only. Operation "Just Cause" and last week's drug summit in Colombia are clear examples, the former being a grandstanding ploy that did a little more than reduce Bush's wimp image and the latter a commendable act of bravery and initiative.

U.S. criticizes human rights violations

WASHINGTON (AP) — China, Nicaragua and Iraq were sharply critized by the State Department yesterday in an annual human rights report to Congress that also documents beheadings and amputations in Saudi Arabia and floggings in Iran.

In the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip, the report said the human rights situation is "a source of deep concern."

Palestinian Arabs are in the 27th month of an uprising against Israeli control.

From student detentions in Liberia to disappearances in El Salvador, the 1,641-page report catalogues man's inhumanity to man in virtually every conceivable way.

In Burma, men forced to walk ahead of army troops in mine-infested fields are blown up. In Iran, prisoners are flogged and suspended from the ceiling, according to eyewitnesses and human rights groups.

Pro-democracy demonstrators were gunned down in Beijing's Tiananmen Square June 3-4, and independent observers are cited as challenging the official toll of 20 executions as unrealistically low.

The report also finds areas of improvement, most conspicuously in the Soviet Union. "Authorities have adopted a more forthcoming approach to foreign criticism of their human rights record," the report said.

And yet, though the top leadership no longer fosters anti-Semitism and appears embarrassed by it, "there has been a sharp increase in popular expressions of anti-Semitic attitudes," the report relates. "Jews have been increasingly concerned over the danger of violence."

Israel, a democracy, comes in for little criticism outside of the situation in the occupied territories.

A total of 432 Palestinians were reported killed in 1989, 304 by Israeli security forces and settlers and 128 by other Israelis.

While the Israeli defense forces engaged in a severe crackdown, the report cites a significant increase in Palestinian violence against Palestinians, spurred by a growing Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement.

James Zogby, executive director of the Arab American institute, called the report a brutal indictment of Israeli occupation, said pro-Israel groups applied pressure to mute the criticism and that Congress should either cut the $3 billion in aid to Israel or make it conditional on an improved record.

The Israeli Embassy in Washington issued a statement saying, "Israel's measures have not differed from those applied by other democratic countries when facing violence in the form of riots, armed assaults, murder and terror."

The report found a dramatic deterioration in the human rights climate in China in 1989. Apart from the Beijing massacre, the army killed scores of Tibetans in March in Lhasa and reports of torture of persons accused of "counter-revolutionary crimes" are persistent. Iraq's human rights record is described as "abysmal," with effective opposition to government policy stifled.

Elderly woman wins case

BENNINGTON, Vt. (AP) — Luella Wilson's fight to save her home and life savings ended in victory Tuesday in a court settlement that lets her keep both.

The settlement, reached during the noon hour on the first day of the trial, in effect overturns a jury verdict two years ago that Wilson, 92, had to give up her home and life savings, valued at $950,000.

The 1987 jury had found her liable for severe injuries suffered by Mark Vince, who had been riding in a car driven by Wilson's great nephew in a 1984 accident.

Wilson had either given or loaned her great nephew, Willard Stuart, the money to buy the car and jurors felt she should have known Stuart lacked a driver's license.

Because Superior court Judge Arthur O'Dea placed a gag order on all parties involved in the settlement, details were not available. But all sides said they were happy with the settlement.

"The terms of that I'm not at liberty to say," said Wilson's lawyer, Frederick Harlow, outside the courthouse shortly after the settlement was reached. "I will say that Mrs. Wilson gets all of her property back."

Wilson learned of the settlement at home in a 12:30 p.m. telephone call from Harlow. Sitting at her kitchen table later Tuesday afternoon and sipping a shot of whiskey, Wilson said she was happy to win and expected to sign the settlement agreement Tuesday night or Wednesday.

"I don't feel very damned good. I can't walk, but I did win," she said.

Vince, leaving the courthouse in his wheelchair, said he was pleased with the terms of the agreement.

In opening argument Tuesday morning, Wilson's lawyer, Harlow told jurors Vince, not Wilson, must bear the blame for the fact he is mostly paralyzed and has lost a leg.

"Mr. Vince knew the designated driver was drinking beers, having some marijuana. Mr. Vince knew that," Harlow told jurors.

That theme was echoed by J. Fred Carbine, the lawyer for the car dealership that sold Stuart the car.

"If there should be any fault, we should consider the plaintiff's own negligence," he told jurors. "I say use your common sense. This was a bad day for Mark Vince, a day that ruined his life, but we didn't do it."

Wilson, who was too ill to testify at the 1987 trial, attended the opening of Tuesday's session, but left after watching Stuart testify.

She cried while watching him on the stand and later said being there was too much of a strain.

On Monday Wilson rejected settlement offers that she leave her home and assets to Vince upon her death. "My husband Harry would roll over in his grave if I ever did that," she said.

Vince's lawyer had argued that Wilson, the car dealership and the car salesman were negligent in loaning Stuart money and selling him a car knowing he did not have a license and was not competent to drive.

"These defendants, they knew when they supplied this car to Willard Stuart Jr. that he didn't have a license, that he didn't have a permit, and that he had flunked the permit test three times," said Rolf Sternberg, one of Vince's lawyer.

"Mrs. Wilson had no reason to consider her nephew an unsafe driver, someone she should not lend money to," Harlow countered.

In his opening arguments Sternberg detailed the trauma the accident inflicted on Vince, who he said has had 16 operations and one leg amputated since the accident.

"What had happened was he had snapped in two like a stick," Sternberg said of the accident.

Stuart testified on Tuesday that he had often used alcohol and marijuana, had taken Wilson's car without permission and had once blown the engine. He also said that he had told Wilson he had failed his driver's license test three times.

Guerillas cry 'Death to gringos'

BOGOTA, Columbia (AP) — A leftist guerrilla group holding two Americans captive Tuesday declared "Death to gringos" and said they had targeted all U.S. interests in Columbia for attack.

President Virgilio Barco called an urgent meeting of the National Security Council.

Earlier Tuesday, at Barco's urging, a federal court pardoned 35 members of another guerrilla group - the April 19 Movement, known as the M-19 — accused of taking part in the 1985 takeover of the Palace of Justice that killed 95 people, including 11 Supreme Court Justices.

Tuesday's threats came from the National Liberation Army, known as the ELN, one of six guerrilla groups in Columbia. The die-hard rebel group is under the command of Manuel Perez, a former Catholic priest, and has been attacking throughout Colombia in the past five days.

The ELN sent a letter to the families of two Americans kidnapped last week by its guerrillas in the northwestern city of Medellin, according to Colombian news reports.

The letter, in Spanish, was directed to the families of James Donnelly, a 65-year-old mechanical engineer from Detroit, and David Kent, a 40-year-old school teacher from Indianapolis.

ELN said it abducted the two men on Feb. 13 to protest President Bush's visit to the port city of Cartagena last Thursday to attend an anti-drug summit.

"We are inclined to give a lesson in respect to the government of the United States, and if it intervenes in Colombia there will be an uprising like in Vietnam and El Salvador," the letter said.

"Our position will change only when North America suspends its ways of intervening and of military aggression in Latin America."

News accounts read on the radio identified some of the U.S. targets cited as Occidental Petroleum, Texaco and other U.S. oil companies and enterprises.

Caterpillars versus cocaine

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Bush administration is pushing research into a possible new combatant in the war against cocaine — a caterpillar with a taste for coca leaves — but officials said Tuesday that the insects won't be deployed in South America unless local governments approve.

"We are not undertaking any biological war," said president Bush's spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater. 'Neither troops nor caterpillars will go in without prior request and consultation."

Peruvian and Bolivian growers supply the vast majority of the world's coca leaves, the raw material for cocaine.

Colombians process and transport most of the world's finished cocaine.

A Peruvian Embassy spokesman said the ambassador met with Bush administration officials after a story on the caterpillar program appeared in The Washington Post on Tuesday.

The ambassador was assured the United States would not take action without the Peruvian government's approval, said the spokesman, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"I think they are trying to keep the spirit of Cartegena, the site of a four-nation drug summit last week, which was a good feeling of consultation and cooperation between the four countries," the spokesman said.

A Bolivian official, who also asked not to be identified, said his country's environmental concerns have prompted it to reject the use of chemical agents to destroy cocoa crops, and the same concerns probably will lead his government also to reject the use of biological agents.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Long-standing family conflicts can be handles diplomatically. Face up to your responsibilities. Listen when a child asks for help. Your creativity will return, boosting you to a position of power.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A verbal free-for-all is a positive force, opening up new avenues of communication; the entire family benefits. Write down your original ideas. Big changes lie ahead. Handle romance with kid gloves.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Take your time when making important decisions. Try to consider all the alternatives. Thoughts of unpaid bills can create tension. Get together with fun people and forget about things you cannot change.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): This may be a day when sensitivities run too high for comfort. Use your wonderful sense of humor. Romance is volatile - just the way you secretly like it! Social demands keep you busy.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Couples find greater peace of mind once they talk things out. Pour on the charm and you get your way! A telephone call lifts your spirits. Avoid getting involved in your neighbor's affairs.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Make the most of a golden opportunity. New financial gains are indicated. Athletic endeavors leave you breathless but healthier. Be more realistic when it comes to the family budget. Postpone luxury purchases.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Play down any personal differences with your co-workers and teamwork will be easier to obtain. Confusion over a financial matter could cause strife at home. Find out the exact figures involved.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Take time out to solve a financial problem. The possibility of deliberate deception cannot be dismissed. Keep in close touch with faraway business contacts. Parents would welcome a visit or call.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Talent and hard work still offer the best route to success. Distant affairs could put a dent in your cash flow. Do not jump the gun before everything is in place. Traditional values prevail.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Channel your nervous energy into good works. Your imagination and enthusiasm make you unstoppable today. Handle people with more tact. A social event is very much to your liking. A romance could ignite.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Life seems particularly exciting now. An original idea is likely to get a fair hearing. Those in authority will be impressed. Give serious thought to revising a budget. Mate or partner is supportive.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Your work on behalf of a charity or community cause gives you new self-confidence. The good will generated today will pay off handsomely at work. Additional financial rewards are possible soon.

Puck parity presently prevalent in Patrick

NEW YORK (AP) – The six Patrick Division teams aren't far apart – geographically, or in the standings.

With six weeks to go in the regular season, six points separate the first-place New York Islanders and Rangers from the last-place Washington Capitals and Philadelphia Flyers. The Pittsburgh Penguins and New Jersey Devils are in between, trying to climb higher while worrying about missing the playoffs.

"In this division, when you win a couple, you're thinking about first place and when you lose a couple, you're worried about finishing last," Rangers coach Roger Neilson said. "Since the whole division is separated by six points, any team can finish first or last."

Of the six, only Pittsburgh has not spent any time in first place, while the Devils are the only team to avoid last place.

That's not to say that the six teams are very good. Only two, the first-place Islanders and Rangers, are over .500 – and both just one point above the break-even mark. But none are especially bad – no team is more than five points below .500 – and each is capable of finishing anywhere from first to last.

"I think it's parity," ex-Ranger and current Islander Don Maloney said. "These teams are so even and so well-matched, it's impossible for anyone to pull away."

Neilson and the Rangers have made a round trip of the standings. They spent the first two months in first place, dropped to the cellar in a 20-day stretch from mid-December to early January and then climbed back to a share of the lead on Monday by beating the Devils.

"It's an amazing division," said the Rangers' Brian Mullen, who got the game-winner against the Devils in overtime. "Lose two in a row and you wind up on the bottom. It's a low ceiling and a high basement."

Close finishes are nothing new in the Patrick Division. Two years ago, seven points separated the first-place Islanders and last-place Penguins and the fourth-place finishers, the Devils, won the division playoff title.

"It's going to go right down to the last day," Rangers captain Kelly Kisio said. "I don't think you can say there's anyone who won't be there.

"Everyone has a chance because everyone has some character players – players who don't want to lose."

He may be right, but no one shows any signs of winning much of anything, either.

Philadelphia, which has gone from last to first to last, got goaltender Ron Hextall back on Sunday, but faces a six-game road trip.

Washington, the defending division champion, has 13 of its last 19 games at home, but is under .500 at the Capital Centre. The Capitals and Flyers entered yesterday's NHL schedule tied for last place with 56 points.

The Devils, who appeared ready to take control in January, are 0-4-1 in their last five games and 1-7-3 in their last 11, dropping them to fourth, one point ahead of the Capitals and Flyers.

Pittsburgh, now third, appears to have the toughest task. The Penguins are without the NHL's top scorer, Mario Lemieux, and have the most road games.

The most remarkable transformation was achieved by the Islanders, who fell to the bottom of the division in late November, only to ride a two-month hot streak to the top. But the Islanders have dropped three straight just when they looked ready to pull away.

STARS NOT SHINING BRIGHT – Gordon (left) and George Gund, owners of the NHL's Minnesota North Stars, had their demands for renovations to the Metropolitan Center rejected by the facility's commission. The Gunds have threatened to move the team, possibly to Oakland, if demands weren't met.

Women's gymnastics tips Northeastern

Minutewomen win with record performance

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Can we say, "It ain't over until it's over"? Well, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team certainly can.

The Minutewomen came out victorious in this nailbiter of a meet against Northeastern University last night at Boyden Gymnastics Center, setting a new team record of 182 and edging out the Huskies' score of 180.95.

After putting out an average performance on the balance beam, the Minutewomen had cause to worry as the Huskies held on to their two-point lead with a solid performance in the floor exercise. As has been the case lately, though, the Minutewomen saved their best for last, going gangbusters at the right moment in their last event, the floor.

Setting the pace for the Minutewomen, L.B. Cronen began the meet's deciding event, earning an 8.6. Then as the banner on Boyden's gym wall says, the ladies in red got busy. No Minutewoman scored less than a 9.2 as Erin Klier would score, going second in the line-up. Erika Baxter, always a constant for a solid floor performance, deserved higher than what the judges allowed her, posting a 9.25.

From that point on the Minutewomen were golden as Kim Grady and Kristin Turmail scored a 9.4 and a 9.45, respectively. Saving the best for last, freshman sensation Tammy Marshall bested her teammates for the second time in a row on the floor, tumbling high and fine to reach a 9.55.

"We had no idea we won," UMass assistant coach Letitia Selk said. "We really pulled together on the floor."

Starting out slowly in their first event, the Minutewomen were a little rusty on the vault. Only Marshall and Turmail would break the 9.0 mark, scoring a 9.55 and a 9.5, respectively. Grady had the Minutewomen's next highest score of an 8.75 opening the door for the Huskies to take 45.85-45.05 lead.

In the second event of the rotation, UMass coach Alfie Mitchell had reason to be concerned, recalling the falls of his gymnasts on the uneven bars in their meet against the University of New Hampshire.

The Minutewomen put those worries to rest, redeeming themselves for their poor performance on Saturday. Turmail showed her team how the bars should be done, posting a 9.45, definitely proving that her fall in the UNH meet was just a fluke. Marshall also came out strong, shining that never-ending smile of hers throughout her 9.0 routine.

The Huskies didn't let-up though, posting a team total of 46 during their vault rotation, allowing them to retain their lead, 91.85-90.25.

If things weren't narrow enough, the balance beam turned the meet into a whole different ballgame for both teams. Counting a total of four falls on the beam, the Minutewomen still managed to put together a respectable rotation. Marshall, adding to her impressive individual total of 37.35, led UMass with a 9.25. Grady followed a close second, earning a 9.2.

"On the beam, we missed some major elements, which are always unpredictable," Selk said. "Besides the falls, everything else in our routines was flawless."

For the Huskies, their rotation on the beam was very unkind. With none of their gymnasts breaking the 9.0 range, NU opened the door to their doghouse for the Minutewomen as their highest score would only be Judy Sidel's 8.65.

Depth the key to repeat of championship for Minutemen

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

Yes, sports fans, it's that time of year again. It's the time of year all of swimming in New England waits for.

The New England Championships start this morning in Kingston, R.I. The Minutemen will go into the tournament with an undefeated record, and are favored to win. The tournament will run through Saturday afternoon.

The Minutemen are three-time defending New England champs, and are planning to repeat again. Coach Russ Yarworth feels that his team has more depth than the 14 other teams they will be facing.

"We have a lot of depth this season," said Yarworth. "We've got experience in the senior class, and the freshman class has got more talent in it than any other class I've had."

The Minutemen will be led by their experienced senior class. This group of guys has never lost this tournament. As freshmen, they came in and won their first N.E. Championship. Three years later, they're graduating and planning on getting their fourth straight title.

"I expect all the seniors to do well this weekend because of their experience," said Yarworth. "I'm really hoping to see the underclassmen rise to the challenge."

There are six freshmen on the 17-man squad. These freshmen, along with the sophomores and juniors, are where Yarworth hopes to win most of the teams points.

"Guys like [Brian] McIver, [Jim] Robertson and [G.T.] Ladd will win their events," said Yarworth. "We need the underclassmen to finish high up in the races for us to win. I think we can do that."

The Minutemen may be favored to win, but that doesn't mean it will be easy. Boston College and Southern Connecticut should give the team a good show. The University of Rhode Island can't be counted out either, as they have the home pool advantage. The Minutemen shouldn't see anything out of the ordinary because they have faced, and beaten, everyone at the Championships.

"It all comes down to depth," said Yarworth. "I just want to go down there and cause some serious damage."

> We need the underclassmen to finish up high in the races for us to win. I think we can do that . . . it all comes down to depth. I just want to go down there and cause some serious damage.

The men's swim team shoots for its fourth straight New England title beginning today.

Sports on tap this weekend

A full weekend of sports action kicks off today, as the men's swim team heads to Kingston, R.I. looking for its fourth consecutive New England championship. The women's basketball team is in Pittsburgh to battle Duquesne University.

Tomorrow, the men's track team travels to MIT for the New Englands, while Saturday, the women's team does the same at Boston University.

Also Saturday, the men's hoop team visits Olean, N.Y. to play St. Bonaventure, while the women trek to Morgantown, W.Va. to face West Virginia. The men's gymnastics team travels to Army.

Women's hoop at Duquesne

Minutewomen seeking second A-10 victory

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

Jan. 18, 1990. Thirty-five days ago. The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team plays host to Duquesne and defeats the Duchesses, 70-54, before 100 fans in Curry Hicks Cage. Helen Freeman carries the team, scoring 17 points and grabbing 10 rebounds.

Tonight the site will be different (the A.J. Palumbo Center in Pittsburgh) but the teams will be the same. UMass coach Kathy Hewelt hopes the outcome will also be the same. Duquesne is the lone team the Minutewomen (4-20, 1-15) have defeated in the A-10 this season and Hewelt would love to grab another victory in the league.

Duquesne coach Renee DeVarney undoubtedly feels the same way.

Her team is tied with UMass for the bottom spot in the A-10. The Duchesses are 1-13 in the league and 3-19 overall.

If UMass is to once again come up with the W it must focus on stopping guard Darcie Vincent. In the first game she burned the UMass defense for 28 points. In addition, she grabbed six rebounds and nine steals.

However, she was the lone bright spot for her team that night. Duquesne shot 18-77 that night, including 1-14 from the three-point line. Forward Megan Cullen jacked up 24 shots, converting on but two of them. The Minutewomen can only hope she plays somewhere near that bad tonight.

For UMass, coming off a tough 66-60 weekend loss to St. Bonaventure, the key once more will be balanced scoring. In the earlier victory against Duquesne four Minutewomen found themselves scoring double figures. Hewelt has said time and time again that the way for UMass to be victorious is to spread the scoring around.

It happened the last time they played the Duchesses. Hewelt hopes it happens again tonight.

Dangerous Papers deliver some serious rock

By JIM COHEN
Collegian Staff

"It's like eating an entire raw onion; your eyes begin to water and your head begins to burn. It's a really intense feeling, sort of like a good sexual experience," Dangerous Papers' bass guitarist Dan Leary said, explaining the feeling one has at a Papers performance.

Local residents will have the chance to experience for themselves, 9 p.m. Saturday at the Hatch, when the band makes its debut at the University.

Brett Jenkins, the guitarist for the group added to what Leary said, "We don't want to be classified a fun band. We take ourselves seriously and we put ourselves into the songs."

While the band may take their music seriously, they are careful not to take themselves too seriously. In their numerous performances around Boston, they have juxtaposed a very professional musical capability along with a fiery excitement among the crowd.

The band is composed of Jenkins, Leary, Tony Lechner on lead vocals, keyboards and trumpet (all UMass students) and Todd "The Judge" Young on drums. In addition to the regular members of the band, a horn section will be included for this weekend's show.

The band is heavily influenced from many different sources, including jazz and classical as well as rock music. The elements from which they have drawn are various. For example, the progressive music of the 70s is as much a part of them as is the alternative music of this past decade. However, the band hesitates to give a list of influences because they are concerned about being pigeonholed into a particular category using a few lines from a newspaper article.

"We have a respect for musical opinions," said Leary.

The band has until recently performed exclusively in metro-Boston, but has begun playing at local colleges. Most importantly, they are playing. As Leary explains, "Nothing is better for us than playing . . . loud."

The band does have its quieter moments, though, with their acoustic songs. The acoustic numbers are not always planned, however. "One time while we were playing our PA system blew up, so we continued playing acoustically," said Jenkins.

One aspect of the band which they feel separates them from most bands is the extent they go to learn a song, even if it's a cover.

"It's not just knowing the chords. We learn the song completely and continuously practice. It's more than copying something that someone else has done. It's enjoying playing, running, making faces and getting into what we're doing," said Leary.

The band is especially deft in their three-part harmonies and different vocal arrangements. They work together to create successful singing parts, working well off one another.

The combination of their vocal and musical talents, along with whatever surprising elements they add to the show, such as yo-yo tricks, usually causes that really intense feeling to which Leary alluded before.

They leave a warm feeling in your tummy.

Jewish folk for all folks

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

"I usually teach children Jewish music. So, I figured if I could do it for children, I could do it for people my own age," said Zamrim founder and director Gary Kabler.

Kabler, whose musical background includes four years of classical voice training from Hartt School of Music, is a University of Massachusetts music major and music teacher at the Jewish Community of Amherst. He believes that the time is right for a Jewish choir, who sing many of their songs in Hebrew.

"Americans are becoming more open-minded to music that is not English," Kabler said. "Now is the time to get this music out so that the general public can become aware."

Zamrin (Hebrew for "singers") came to be when Kabler put an ad in the first issue of the Hillel calendar. He got an immediate response and the chorus is continuing to grow.

"We keep adding people daily," Kabler said, "because more people want to join. As long as they can carry a tune and want to sing the music we want to sing, they're in."

The chorus at last count included ten members. They include Kabler, who also plays guitar and keyboards, Mandy Janis, guitarist David Beroll, Haywood "Woody" Gelman, Debbie Kahn, flautist Aaron Sinewitz, Toni "Tovah" Hecher, Cheryl Obedin, Jill Orenstein and Michael Wall. All are UMass students except for Obedin, who attends Mt. Holyoke. Wall is the group's only graduate student.

Saturday night's concert in the Student Union Cape Cod Lounge ("It's the kind of setting I was looking for," said Kabler.) promises the usual Zamrin offering of contemporary and traditional Jewish and Israeli songs. The chorus will perform such standards as "Bashana Haba'ah," "Eili, Eili" and the Kolos song, "Freedom."

But Saturday night's performance also promises some special treats, including the song "Im Ein Ani Li Mi Li," which means, "If I am not for myself, who will be for me?." The music was written by Kabler and the lyrics consist wholly of sayings from Rabbi Hillel.

Another feature of the night's performance includes Woody Gelman's singing and guitar solo for the song "East Bound Train." The song was written by a friend of Gelman's and, according to Kabler, is a very beautiful song. "It's not Jewish, but I didn't mind," said Kabler.

Zamrin will also be performing the standard "Jerusalem, My Queen," which is soon to be the theme song of the PBS show, Reflections on Judaism and Israel. After the Cape Cod Lounge concert, the chorus will fly to New York to record the song as well as do a performance for the show.

The concert, which begins at 7:30 p.m., is free and open to the public. Refreshments will be served.

The milk and cookies of the blues

By DAKKAN ABBE
Collegian Correspondent

At the root of what we call rock 'n' roll is the blues. The blues of Robert Johnson, Blind Blake and Brownie McGhee. The acoustic blues of one person, needing no one else to create the music. Acoustic blues is intensely personal, emotional, raw at times. Robert Johnson bared his soul so intensely it hurt to listen sometimes.

Listening to Jorma Kaukonen play and sing the blues is like chocolate chip cookies, milk or honey; comfortable and just plain delicious.

Kaukonen was a founding member of the legendary and colossal band, Jefferson Airplane. He was the lead guitarist for the group and led them on their extended psychedelic explorations of rock 'n' roll music.

After leaving Jefferson Airplane in 1972, he and bassist Jack Cassady formed Hot Tuna. Hot Tuna explored both the acoustic and electric blues in an innovative way that gave them a large underground following.

After breaking up with Hot Tuna in 1978, Jorma formed the strange band, White Gland. He had himself extensively tattooed and dyed his shortend hair various shades of florescent pink and white.

After that short-lived project, he spent much of the 80s touring as a solo acoustic player. He recorded a live acoustic record in 1984. It was recorded in a club and the audience is obviously small and enthusiastic, quite like the audience at a typical Iron Horse show. He plays truly powerful acoustic blues ripping notes from the belly of his guitar and growling like a bear cub, rough yet soft.

He also plays extended jams that go far beyond the realm of most traditional blues forms, adding his unique qualities to the form which is the basis for rock music today. This Saturday, Kaukonen will be playing at the Iron Horse, demonstrating his powerful command over the guitar.

Also playing will be the highly regarded female blues artist, Rory Block. Over the last 10 years, Block has made a name for herself as the foremost female practitioner of country blues. Both her playing and singing have been compared to early Bonnie Raitt, yet it is generally agreed that Block exceeds Raitt in originality and intensity.

On her most recent album, Block employed such guest artists as Stevie Wonder and Taj Mahal, no doubt two "session" men of great fame.

It seems unlikely that neither Block or Kaukonen will ever achieve major popular success inside the genres that they have chosen to perform. However it would be a crying shame to miss these two vital and powerful musicians this Saturday, where, in the cozy and intimate environment of the Iron Horse, they will serve up some of the best acoustic blues this area will ever see.

Santa Sangre: more than horror

By WILLIAM GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

"I begin from the world of madness, and I try to find the light," Alejandro Jodorowsky, the man behind the celluloid sensation Santa Sangre, has said of his attempts in film. True.

Halfway through Santa Sangre, I rushed out of the theater, pushed past two patrons and skidded my icy way to the trash barrel in front of Pleasant Street Theater. With a teary eye, I launched into four minutes of heaving a day's worth of digestables into said container.

Wiping mouth and eyes I then did something odd. I walked back in and enjoyed the rest of the film.

Before that moment I had witnessed the bold colorful images of a woman praying to Santa Sangre, a Saint of blood who protected her virginity from rapists at the cost of having her arms cut off. The shrine for this saint, including a pool of blood, is bulldozed to crumbs after being condemned by a member of the real church.

An elephant appeared to be having a nose bleed; blood was gushing out of the trunk, as a troupe of circus musicians played an eulogy to the dying beast. Carried in a massive coffin to the local dump, the great carcass is ravaged by the shanty town residents.

All of this is taking place in a circus atmosphere, which adds to the hallucinatory atmosphere when the woman who prays to Santa Sangre finds her husband, the strong man, engaged in flagro delecto with the tattooed lady. With a righteous indignation she throws acid into her husbands groin, and he, in righteous retaliation, severs his wife's arms with two knives, before cutting his own throat.

All of this would be well and good if it hadn't been witnessed by the young son of the dead strongman and his armless wife. Having seen it though, he ends up in a mental institution, specifically in a room with a crucifix-like tree. His mother calls to him and the now-grown boy climbs out of the room, metaphorically falling into his mother's arms.

Then I threw up.

Returning, things get strange, as the boy's arms literally become a part of the mother's anatomy, leading to knitting, a charming stage act, some piano playing and a little murder. There's one very graphic murder scene, but it's the scenes of quiet beauty, such as a mother playing the piano with her son's arms, that are most unsettling. The unnatural and grotesque becomes acceptable, even beautiful.

The film has been called a cross between Bunnel and Hitchcock. That's nice and accurate, but here's something a little more descriptive:

Imagine Hitchcock's Psycho, only you're Norman Bates and your mother has no arms and everything is washed in a near day-glo intensity of Technicolor. A lot of blotter, like your worst and best trips combined. Throw it all into a manual blender and go to Mexico City and . . .

It's a strange film. But that's because the history of film thus far has been a long, narrow, ever-thinning corridor called narrative.

We, the collective audience have an ingrained notion of film as good guys and bad guys, sex and violence; a reflection of what we think our dreams are. Like Plato's cave theory, we're a mass of smug ignorance when it comes to tasting something different.

And that's what Santa Sangre is, a strong taste of something different. It's a horror film that goes far beyond the limits of that genre. It gives the action, the violence, a true motivation: a boy's love for his mother. So you can relate. And logically you can relate to the murders, the knifings, all of it.

Jodorowsky has said "I love violence because the poetry is there. For me the highest level is poetry. But what kind of poetry? The poetry is the act, and I am searching for the poetical act." A small truth: you'll never find any poetry in criticism, but for the encouragement to experience another's vision made material.

It is certainly the most exciting slice of art in the area. So stop reading about it and go see it, even if you have the flu. You'll leave having had an experience.

Santa Sangre East coast test screening continues at Pleasant St. Theater through March 1.

Positively not another Boston garage band

By M.J. MURPHY
Collegian Correspondent

A lot of Boston bands share something in common, acts like The Neiboorhoods, Scruffy The Cat and Del Fuegos; straight forward rock and roll. They all sound like they literally record their music in a garage.

O Positive is certainly an exception.

With a sound that laces the delicate balance of ethereal harmony and what lead man David Herlihy describes as "fractured rhythms," O Positive's critically acclaimed debut EP Only Breathing, pushed them to the forefront of Boston's music scene. The tunes range from the upbeat, danceable "With You," through the moody introspection of "Weight of Days," to the well-familiar eerie blend of "Up, Up, Up."

Released in 1985 on Throbbing Lobster Records, Only Breathing stayed at the top of Boston's WFNX music chart for several months. With the collective success of the band, Herlihy was chosen as the 1988 Male Singer of the Year (independent label) at the Boston Music Awards. He shared the spotlight with the likes of Pat Metheny, Steven Tyler of Aerosmith and the Cars.

Formed in 1983, the name of the band came from a local blood drive. "It's the universal donor," explained Herlihy. "People told us we ought to have an anthem, like, 'It runs through us all.' Like, come on, that's gross."

Made up of vocalist Herlihy, guitarist/keyboardist Alan Petitti, drummer Alex Lob and bassist Dave Ingham, O Positive as a collective prefer to disconnect themselves with any type of "Boss-Town sound" stigma.

'We don't have that Boss-Town sound," Herlihy said. "We don't live in a garage. I could get a guitar now and write a song . . . 'My Baby's Under the Hood' . . . big deal. Maybe if I were 18, I'd be doing that. I don't think it's hard to write a three-chord song, although some three chord songs are pure genius."

The ability to blend several simple chords is an important component of the band's songs. To achieve their unique mix, O Positive derives its sound from many genres of music. Each member in the band picks up ideas from styles like funk, new age and rock 'n' roll. Herlihy continued, "Hell, if I hear something interesting in a Frank Sinatra song for example, I'll try it out with the rest of the band."

As fresh as the music may be, Herlihy's raspy voice and intentionally ambiguous lyrics cannot escape the inevitable comparison with one extremely famous band – R.E.M.

Herlihy is quick to dismiss this connection, "If anything, they'll say we are like R.E.M. because we don't dress up."

Carrying the mesmerizing sound of their EPs to their live performances, O Positive can carry its audience through a captivating carpet ride of musical experiences. The atmosphere of their performance reflects the rich moodiness, complexity and uplifting versatility of their songs.

Condom Conundrum*

by Gretchen Krull, Health Educator

Although the basic message PRACTICE SMART SEX - use a condom and/or oral (dental) dam is resounding around campus, there is more to the "art of SMART SEX".

Did you know?

Condoms do indeed come in different sizes. Kimono and Snugger are a slightly shorter and narrower condom. MAXX condoms are wider and longer. Choose a condom that fits you or your partner comfortably. It should roll to the end of the penis shaft (near the body).

Condoms break, most often with inexperienced users. The primary cause of condom breakage is insufficient lubrication either natural or added. We highly recommend using either a condom with spermicide or additional spermicide to solve this problem. Condom manufacturers have upgraded the latex to be more durable. So, if you've had problems in the past try again.

Also, breaks do occur if the condom is rolled onto the penis improperly (most commonly inside out and don't laugh it happens easily). Practice in situations that aren't risky so you'll be prepared.

Condoms with spermicide are NOT a good method if contraception is needed. More problem pregnancies are being reported by women claiming to have used condoms as their primary method. The amount of spermicide that kills virus, is insufficient to aid significantly to avoid pregnancy. Use additional spermicide in the form of foam, jelly, suppositories or film (Vaginal Contraceptive Film) or other additional methods of birth control.

Condoms are more available on campus than before. Beginning this semester residence halls have installed condom machines. Many of the machines are located in laundry rooms, and common lounge bathrooms. The condoms sell for $.75 for one or three for $1.50. There continues to be a machine in the Campus Center Concourse men's room. In addition, most condoms are sold for three for $1.00 at the University Health Services Pharmacy, with varieties available. Because it is an over-the-counter item you will not have to wait. The Campus Center Store and the Munchies Stores also carry a small selection of condoms.

Condoms can be used for oral sex on a man or on a woman. The condom is an obvious barrier during oral sex on a man. (The only consideration to make is the use of spermicides outside the condom. However, spermicidally lubricated condoms taste very bitter.) But you may not know that a non-lubricated condom can be cut at the tip and up the side to form a durable latex square similar yet thinner than an oral (dental) dam.

Oral (dental) dams are available at the UHS Pharmacy for $9.55 for 36 5" X 5" squares but otherwise are only available from dental supply houses. So, the trick of cutting a condom may come in handy.

We are aware that it is not always easy to incorporate safer sex practices into one's life even when you know it's the RIGHT THING to do. Ask questions of your friends; call us for some tips; be patient and take risks. It becomes easier with practice.

*An intricate dilemma.

Duffey to take on presidency of UMass

Collegian file photo

Chancellor Joseph Duffey

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Chancellor Duffey agreed yesterday to assume the additional responsibility of president of the University of Massachusetts for two years, but said he is "somewhat reluctant" to take on the dual role.

Duffey will take over for President David C. Knapp on March 17, the day after Knapp is scheduled to formally step down and end his 12-year tenure.

Gordon Oakes, chairman of the board of trustees, said the positions are being combined to cut costs in light of the state's fiscal troubles.

Duffey will oversee the Amherst, Worcester and Boston campuses of the University. His salary will be increased from $108,999 to $130,000 per year.

Duffey said he will work with the chancellors and representatives of the board of trustees to plan for a reduction of personnel and functions of the president's office and the relocation of some of those functions to the three campuses.

Oakes said the board will not know how much money will be saved until April 1, when the reduction and restructuring plan will be ready.

After the announcement at the trustees meeting yesterday, Duffey called the move "a risky and bold experiment" which will relocate some functions of the president's office to the Amherst campus.

The president's staff, which comprises about 30 employees, will suffer personnel and program cuts. Other functions will be relocated to the respective campuses.

Duffey did not provide specific details of the restructuring plan, but said he will work with the chancellors on a plan to be outlined by April 1.

Duffey said he is unsure if his two positions will be permanently combined.

Several vice chancellors from UMass said because Duffey's new duties will require him to spend time on the other campuses, additional responsibilities will be shifted onto them.

Despite the unanimious approval by the trustees for Duffey's appointment, rumbles of discontent surfaced from the Boston campus.

Representatives from UMass-Boston called for a system in which the three campuses' chancellors would serve as president on a rotating basis. Duffey did not reject the idea, and said his two-year term will be evaluated.

Knapp said he first expressed interest in stepping down more than a year ago, but agreed to remain in the position to help the University through the state's fiscal troubles.

Knapp, a tenured professor, will be appointed to one of two Ralph Waldo Emerson professorships at one of the UMass campuses, to be paid from a private fund.

GEO asks for help of undergrads

GEO calls for "No business as usual" for March 1

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization presented to the Union of Undergraduates last night possible steps undergraduates could take when graduate student employees hold a work stoppage on March 1.

Mark Kenen, a GEO coordinating committee member, recommended that undergraduates support the organization by asking professors not to teach on the work stoppage day or by holding classes off campus.

Kenen also requested undergraduates to join teaching assistants and research assistants on the picket line at what he called an "obvious location," the Whitmore Administration Building.

"I think it would be a great move for the undergraduates to target Whitmore," he said.

"I don't want to tell you what to do on March 1," he said. "But the more pressure we put on the administration the more effective the work stoppage will be."

Kenen called the GEO's requests, "No Business As Usual" actions.

"We need the undergraduates' support because TAs and RAs are putting their jobs, tuition waivers and education on the lines," he said. "And without TAs this university could not run."

Kenen told the group of about twenty people that he hopes the March 1 action to blossom into a greater movement against the budget cuts affecting the Massachusetts higher education system.

"This has to be the start of the spring," he said. "We are going to kick off the spring with a boom."

The GEO has scheduled a "Union Yes!" rally on March 1 at noon in the Student Union Ballroom. All campus unions are expected to attend to show their support.

The GEO broke off negotiations with the administration last Wednesday chiefly over the issue of union recognition. On the next day, the organization voted by an overwhelming majority to hold a one-day work stoppage.

The administration has said that it will not hold any negotiation sessions with the GEO until it calls off the work stoppage. GEO officials have said they have no plans to do so.

Soviet students encounter America

By JULIA SEREBRINSKY
Collegian Correspondent

Everything in the world has turned on its head recently. The Germans have become outspoken pacifists. The Republicans support defense cuts. The Russians purport political freedom and praise private enterprise. James Bond couldn't care less about the KGB concoctions.

And the Soviet student delegation at the University of Massachusetts sneers at communism.

Gone are the days when the Soviet stone-faced "missionaries" lackadaisically chanted "we-are-for-peace" rhetoric. The 15 students from the Leningrad Politechnic Institute participating in a three-week exchange with UMass students, share what seems to be their candid and personal impressions of the Soviet Union and the United States. The analysis they offer is as polemically diverse as would be expected from any American Political Science classroom discussion.

Aleksey Kavokin, 19, a physics student from the institute, was conspicuously expressing anti-Soviet sentiment. On one occasion he referred to the Soviet society as "fantastically idiotic and crazy." For communism he expressed nothing but scorn.

"As an ideology, communism is not only worthless, but harmful and dangerous," he said. "Being a totalitarian ideology communism bears a close relationship to fascism."

Some of his collegues disagree with him and adhere to the Marxist convictions. Georgy Abdushelishvili, 27, an economics graduate student, said Marx's "utopian dream of communism has simply not been realized.One cannot deny that the capitalist nations are on their way to becoming communist," he said. "We must get on the same economic path as you [Americans] are on. Then we shall both engage in a path towards communism."

Dmitry Butusov, 27, a physics graduate student agrees with Abdushesvili that the resurgence of communism is still possible. Referring to the Eastern bloc countries' latest plunge into the arms of capitalism as "a temporary situation," Butusov predicted they will return to their previous political orientation.

Many of the students do not share the United States' apparent enthusiasm for President Mikhail Gorbachev, however. Dmitry Arsenov, a 26-year-old marketing

Students, faculty celebrate Engineer's week

By MARC RITCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

Recognition and promotion of engineering were strongly emphasized at the Engineer's Week Convocation Wednesday afternoon. More than 100 students and faculty assembled in Marcus Hall in conjunction with a national event to recognize teaching and research in the field of engineering.

Dr. John McCredie, director of external research programs at Digital Equipment Corp., gave the keynote address and outstanding engineering faculty and students were presented awards.

In his speech Dr. McCredie pointed out the obligation that engineers have to serve society. Of the many problems facing the U.S. today, McCredie said that competitiveness of the American worker is one where the engineering profession can make a significant contribution. Without the ability to "compete with the best in the world," McCredie said, "we shall not solve many of the other problems."

Dr. McCredie recognized the University of Massachusetts as a valuable research partner and a new joint effort called "Project Pilgrim" demonstrates this partnership. This project will "help Digital in the important technology of distributed networks of workstations" and will enhance the educational environment for students at UMass. McCredie calls the collaboration between the University and industry "a true win-win situation" because it improves education and creates a better product.

As part of the program about 45 engineering students were initiated into "Order Of The Engineer", an organization open to all engineering graduates.

In recognition of outstanding teaching, two faculty members were honored and 14 students received outstanding service awards. Phillip R. Westmoreland in chemical engineering and Lawrence Seiford in industrial engineering/operations research were presented the General Electric Outstanding Teaching Awards. The students honored were: Nancy Cianciolo, Thomas Gajewski, Jim O'Rourke, Michael Simms, Jim Watson, Scott Weiss, Robert Marion, Jill Amstein, Gel Penchina, Sue Keopradit, David Paratore, Caroline Dawn, Jennifer Smith and Dan Diamant.

Boston cracks down on violence

BOSTON (AP) — Undercover police are driving in marked cars and a lawmaker says it's time to call for state police reinforcements as authorities try to stem the alarming number of killings in this city.

As of Feb. 21, police say 22 people were fatally shot or knifed. That's close to double the 14 slayings by the same time last year.

All but six of the killings have occurred in parts of Dorchester, Mattapan and Roxbury in a residential area inhabited by about 150,000 people, police spokesman Jim Jordan said Thursday.

Concern about Boston's violence has reached far beyond city limits. The subject preoccupied most of Wednesday's monthly closed meeting of the governor's Anticrime Council, The Boston Globe cited participants as saying.

State Sen. Paul White, a Democrat representing Dorchester, appealed for help from officials of the state justice system. Invoking memories of the tensions during the busing crisis of the 1970s, White suggest having state and metropolitan police assist Boston police in efforts to curb the violence.

"Those agencies helped out during busing and I think we've reached a crisis stage here," white said after the meeting.

This week, in the meantime, a plainclothes police patrolled the most troubled sections of the city in 12 additional marked cruisers. Some undercover officers also donned uniforms before getting behind the wheel.

"Key posts are now going to be covered," said Jordan, the police spokesman, who said he could not disclose the total number of cruisers deployed.

The theory is that increased police visibility will discourage violence and instill confidence in residents that the police are near.

"Basically it's a move away from unmarked units," said Superintendent Paul Evans, who heads the police bureau of Field Services.

"They don't shoot people in front of marked units. We're hoping the increased visibility will be a deterrent to violent crime. Hopefully that will give them pause, and give the neighborhoods a greater sense of security."

After Police Commissioner Francis Roache took over the department in 1985, there was an increase in the number of specialty police units, plainclothes police and officers patrolling in unmarked cars.

Evens credited the use of unmarked cruisers with boosting the arrest rate to last year's 20 percent increase. But he noted that's not enough. "We're making the arrests, but more arrest does not mean less violence."

Response to the deployment of more marked cars was generally favorable in the face of a dire situation.

"It can't get any worse out there," said Sgt. William Broderick, president of the Boston Police Superior Officers Federation and a critic of the administration. The new tactic, he said, "is worth a shot."

Georgette Watson, founder of the grass roots anticrime program Drop-A-Dime, said, "I think that probably will satisfy the community people, to see more uniformed police out on the street."

Earlier this week, Deputy Police Superintendent William Celester, commenting on the numbers of shootings, said that if gang members could shoot straight, there would be even more slayings.

Women sent to prisons for detox

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — Lawyers and activists are seeking a ban on the practice of sending women with alcohol problems to state prisons where they do not receive treatment.

The suit charges that the policy is discriminatory because men who face the same predicament are sent to a prison with a treatment center where they are housed in dormitories, not cells.

"Women with alcohol disabilities are not offered any treatment or rehabilitation for their condition. They are labeled as criminals, stigmatized with imprisonment and denied even the minimal medical care and supervision necessary for appropriate detoxification," reads the motion for preliminary injunction filed Wednesday in Hampshire Superior Court.

The state has until March 8 to respond to the motion, which stems from a 1987 lawsuit filed on behalf of Susan M. Hinckley and later broadened to include other women.

"Basically, what we're trying to do is to get the court to order the state to cease its practice of sending women to MCI-Framingham, women who have committed no crimes but simply suffer from alcoholism," said Cathy Costanzo, a lawyer with the Center for Public Representation in Northampton which is handling the case. State officials say they don't like the situation either.

"These women do not belong in prison," said Joseph Landolfi, spokesman for Secretary of Human Services Philip W. Johnston. "We are in the process of reviewing the statute. Hopefully, in the future we'll make some announcement that will eliminate this practice."

More than 100 women were sent to Framingham last year. Costanzo cited Hinckley's experiences an example of the situations women may face.

"She was locked in a cell with a woman who had been accused of murdering a disabled child and the woman recounted in glory detail the events leading up to the murder. Susan was terrified the entire time she was there," Costanzo aid.

Kathy robertson, spokeswoman for the state Department of Correction, said the state doesn't feel the women belong in prison, but there aren't many options.

"There are just simply not enough beds in public health facilities to accommodate women," she said. "The ways to get out of it are either to change the laws or to create more beds."

Under Massachusetts law, people with alcohol disabilities can be committed for up to 30 days for treatment, either through being picked up by police or by family members.

Task force combats hunger in Amherst

By JOSEPH M. MONTAGNA
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Hunger Task Force, a student-run organization which works to overcome the problem of hunger in the Amherst community, held a meeting in the Student Union Tuesday night and discussed upcoming events in its effort to fight hunger.

The Hunger Task Force began in the late 70s as a political organization but now concentrates on the "local action." Some of the activities that the group has been involved in are food drives, fund raisers, collecting and growing food, plus direct contact with a food bank.

All students can join the group and participate in as many activities as they can.

"We allow students to work on the problems of hunger," said Rolph Fishburn-Parker, a senior entomology major and one of the group's leading members.

The Hunger Task Force works often with the local soup kitchen called "Not Bread Alone" which is located at the congregational church on Main Street in downtown Amherst. The group also can be creative. Last Halloween they held a "Trick or Treat for Hunger" in which group members, dressed up as food products, went around to houses asking for food donations.

"Some people even gave us candy for ourselves," said one member.

But hunger is a serious problem and the Hunger Task Force is dedicated to its cause. They have problems of their own however since the university doesn't recognize them as an official university club since they don't "conform" to official standards such as doing work on campus.

"One of the most important things about us is that we work from no budget but it's a way for the university to interact with the community and students are educated about problems with the real world," said Melissa, a sophomore sociology major.

During the meeting of 10-12 students (the group has about 20 members in all) plans for the future were discussed. Among some of the ideas were a "speaker series" in which professors or other knowledgeable in hunger projects would speak, an information table in the campus center concourse and a walk for hunger in the spring. The task force is also trying to expand its focus into a more national one by writing letters to the legislature.

"We have the grandest ideas," said another member.

For the upcoming weekend, however, the group plans to hold another food drive at a local supermarket.

Member of BOG proposes to ban Spartacists

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

A motion to ban the University of Massachusetts Spartacus Youth Club from the Campus Center was proposed to the Board of Governors last night.

Gov. Bill Hewitt said the BOG should "suspend indefinitely the [SYC's] privileges of using Campus Center meeting rooms or vending space."

Hewitt said the SYC should be suspended for not allowing several conservative students to participate last Tuesday night in its public forum on Germany's political status.

Refusing admittance to students based on their political beliefs is a violation of Massachusetts state law and the BOG constitution, he said.

Hewitt's motion will be discussed at next week's BOG meeting.

In other BOG developments last night:

- The Board rejected a motion to increase the wage of Union Video Center workers from $3.75 to $4.00 an hour. The Board voted 6-2-2 in favor of the 25 cent raise, but a two-thirds majority is required by the BOG constitution on budgetary issues.

Treasurer Garron Carvalho, who strongly endorsed the proposed raise, said it amounted to eight cents an hour from the BOG's perspective.

"Since [the UVC jobs are] work-study, the Board will only be paying one-third of that 25 cent raise," he said.

The BOG debated the motion for more than 45 minutes, with opponents to the raise claiming that UVC did not request it last semester while the BOG was planning its budget.

Gov. Mag Magner said, "We cannot set a precedent here. This is not an issue of eight cents, but one of budgetary procedure."

Referring to the eight cent squabble, Gov. Matt McCarthy said, "This whole thing is asinine."

- The Board voted 10-1-1 to allocate $430 for new publicity posters. The posters, emblazoned with the slogan "BOG: The Pulse of The Campus Center," will inform the campus community about the BOG's functions.

BOG public relations consultant Barry Welch said, "The public isn't really sure what we do. This would be an educational device."

"Students may feel helpless being shoveled around by the administration," he said. "They don't know that we field complaints and can help them."

Carvalho said according to a recent BOG survey, 96 percent of UMass students use the Campus Center, yet only 50 percent are aware of the BOG's role in organizing many activities that go on there.

- Chairperson Sue Gordon said the BOG's ad-hoc research committee on the sale of Playboy, Playgirl, and Penthouse, needs input from the community on research topics. People interested in this issue should drop off their concerns in writing at the BOG office, 817 Campus Center, as soon as possible.

Maribel Rosales, representative of the University of El Salvador, will speak at the University of Massachusetts tonight on matters in El Salvador and recent developments at the University there.

An attack on the University by military forces last November claimed the lives of six Salvadoran priests and two lay women.

A video will be presented explaining the history of the University, as well as the incessant struggle for academic freedom and authority over its own future that the University seeks.

The evening begins at 7 p.m. in room 164-171 of the Campus Center, and admission is free. It is sponsored by the Graduate Student Senate and University of El Salvador Committee.

Christopher Brown, member of the Graduate Student Senate, believes it is imperative that people gain more knowledge about El Salvador.

"This University has a sister relationship with the University of El Salvador. El Salvador itself, is on the cutting edge of Latin American politics," said Brown.

Rosales is a faculty member of the University of El Salvador's International Relations department.

Advocates of financial aid to head to D.C.

By MICHAEL WESTER
Collegian Staff

Forty University of Massachusetts students will leave on a four-day trip to Washington, D.C. early Sunday morning to lobby legislators and their aides for increased federal financial aid and related issues.

The students, all members of the UMass-based group Students Advocating Financial Aid, will conduct approximately 100 interviews with senators, congressmen and their aides to discover and influence their positions on financial aid, according to Gerry Grady, an adviser to SAFA.

"What we're lobbying for is to provide adequate funding for needy, qualified students in higher education," Grady said.

The students will spend all day Monday and Tuesday and Wednesday conducting interviews.

The president of SAFA, Christine Thibodeau, a UMass junior, said the group is planning to meet with Massachusetts Rep. Silvio Conte and Sens. John Kerry and Edward Kennedy, among others.

The trip is a result of a year of planning by SAFA. Arranging interviews, transportation and lodging, as well as convincing students to miss three days of classes, is all part of the process, Thibodeau said.

Thibodeau said the trip is funded by contributions from UMass student area governments, the Student Government Association, and SAFA alumni, as well as through contributions by Chancellor Joseph Duffey, President David Knapp, Vice Chancellor Deirdre Ling, and Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs.

SAFA has been making lobbying trips to Washington since 1978, when the group was formed as part of a class Grady taught on the legislative procedure. SAFA is the only established student lobbying group in the country, Thibodeau said.

In addition to planning and participating in the Washington trip, the group is organizing a spring lobbying trip to the Statehouse in Boston.

Nelson Mandela: A dream is set free

The battle is on!

We as Afrikan-American and Third World students hardly have words to express our joy over the recent release of our comrade and brother, Nelson Mandela.

After 27 years in which many of us were unsure as to whether the great leader would ever see life from outside a prison wall again, his entrance into "the outside" is in itself a small victory of which we should be proud.

The pressure exerted by the international community, consisting of people committed to freedom, justice and equality for the South African people, was a crucial factor in forcing the minority regime in Pretoria to make this concession. However, his release in and of itself is not the major cause of my joy.

The major significance of Mandela's release lies in what he has said and what he is going to do now that he is out of prison and unbanned.

He is a shining example to us in that, even after 27 years of incarceration under the harshest of conditions, he has stood firm in his adherence to the principles of the African National Congress (ANC) and has emerged unbroken. Even greater than this, however, is the fact that his great prestige and influence, both in South Africa and in the international community, will lend greater impetus to the struggle to eradicate apartheid in South Africa.

Comrade Mandela has stated unequivocally that the armed struggle in South Africa must continue, and the ANC and the South African people will let no obstacles stand in the way of their pursuit of liberty, justice and dignity. This statement has tremendous force and significance for the struggle.

Rudy Krigger

The apartheid regime evidently hoped that the unbanning of organizations like the ANC, the SACP (South African Communist Party), the PAC (Pan African Congress) and other liberation groups would allow conflicts to emerge among these groups, and that contradictions between radical youth and the supposedly moderate, older leadership would hamper the progress of the struggle.

Mandela's statement has dashed any such hopes that Pretoria previously had. He will not play a "conciliatory" role in the absence of real and significant steps toward the eradication of apartheid. He will not be isolated from the courageous youth who have been taking the struggle into the streets of South Africa.

Nelson Mandela has clearly recognized, as also we must, that the release of some political prisoners and the unbanning of organizations struggling for liberation does not represent a dismantling of apartheid.

The homelands policy, designed to divide and conquer the African people and to restrict them to the poorest 13 percent of the land (despite the fact that Africans represent 80 percent of the population) has not been dismantled.

Africans still don't have the right to vote and select a government, and they are still economic and political slaves in their own country.

Until such time as these and other changes are made and there is true majority rule in a non-racial South Africa, Mandela and the ANC will continue to struggle for justice by any means necessary. It is this that we must applaud and support.

The battle is on. Pamperi Ne Chimurenga! A Luta Continua!

Doubt overwhelms hope

Amidst the cries of disbelief and joyous celebration shortly after Nelson Mandela's release, a cloud of uncertainty still lingers.

While the White minority government now seems more willing to reach some sort of compromise with leaders of the Black majority, the latter are understandably reacting with much less enthusiasm and much more caution. What lies beneath the surface, after all, is the scariest thought.

Anna R. Santiago

President F.W. de Klerk's present rhetoric is filled with hope for a unified South Africa, ripping at the seams with economic promise. He has displayed eagerness to discuss the idea of "power sharing" between Whites and Blacks, but stops short of supporting a one-person/one-vote mandate.

He will clearly yield nothing when White interests are threatened. He dodges altogether the question of repealing the Group Areas Act, the very foundation of racial segregation in South Africa. Therefore, Whites will remain owners of most of the land and important businesses while Blacks will still have to travel back into their own segregated townships as soon as the work day is over.

For the relatively few, yet ultimately powerful White South African population, the president's move toward a "new South Africa" is a frightening one. Indeed, the idea itself is so unimaginable to them that one might become wary of de Klerk's intentions in the first place.

The deluge of television images of Black and White reaction to the release was bittersweet. But the talk of the possibility of drastic changes within the country's political and social structure send most Whites reeling in disgust and angry. The Blacks can only quietly hope for the best.

What more can the White government take away from them that they haven't already lost?

There is no doubt that de Klerk is the man in the best position to change the course of history and move toward the dismantling of apartheid. However, the steps he has so far taken (and plans to take) are obviously not so much for humanitarian reasons as they are for political ones.

The system of apartheid has never given thought to things that might concern black welfare in the past three centuries. How ironic that Mandela's release should involve "humane considerations," as de Klerk proudly declared in an interview with Ted Koppel on ABC's Nightline.

The bottom line might be that Mandela is free, but that guarantees nothing. His freedom doesn't entail better living conditions for poverty-stricken black families nor does it promise non-White groups any significant political concessions.

Both Black and White South Africans have to start somewhere. It is naive to think that they can begin anew with a blank slate. The suffering of Blacks for generations through the emotional trauma of having to watch loved ones killed or physically hauled away cannot be erased by a White hand extended in conciliation. Even if they are given a chance for economic prosperity, they still have to start from the bottom of a used, filthy barrel.

Black South Africans have to live under Third World conditions in a country so rich. They are violently pulled aside or shot point blank when they dare assemble. For hundreds of years, they have been condemned, denied access to choice land and the freedom to live and learn as they choose solely for the color of their skin. Now that Mandela has rejoined them, will they still have the courage and determination to fight even more forcefully for a truly egalitarian South Africa?

Both sides might now have an arena to accommodate their collective interests, but no fear is greater in the minds of black South Africans than to discover that they are once again getting the raw end of the deal. As usual.

Keeping the torch lit

Civil rights. The deep South. Racism. Martin Luther King.

Anti-apartheid. South Africa. Racism. Nelson Mandela.

Mandela is free. But is he? Is he free in the true sense of the word?

Kim Brater

President F. W. de Klerk may have had no intentions of freeing Mandela at all. True, he is now out of Victor Verster prison, known to inmates as Mandela University.

But where is he now?

He is in the South African spotlight, under tight security in a country that is held together only by threads of a shredding fabric. No doubt will Mandela be hunted down by White supremacists who refuse change in their country.

The possibility of an assassination attempt is quite likely. Surely, de Klerk knew that by releasing Mandela he would have to contend with the White supremacy. Or was he merely handing Mandela over on a silver platter?

Nelson Mandela is the Martin Luther King Jr. of the 1990s. He is tall, stately and speaks with an eloquence unmatched. But for a man of his age, he has much to do before he sees his country truly free.

The problem that seems to be sorely overlooked is the fact that, while apartheid is a force behind White domination in South Africa, the inability of the Black community to unify is far more detrimental to the aspect of breaking White supremacy.

The two Black groups, the United Democratic Front (UDF) and the Incatha, are fighting each other. This is something that de Klerk can neither understand or handle. He needs a middle man, a unifier, a demigod.

He needs Mandela.

But can this tear within the fabric of the Black community be mended? Can it be mended by Mandela?

The roots of this fighting go back to tribal days, yet today these two groups still don't know why they terrorize and slaughter each other. They are brothers in arms in a country seemingly at war with itself.

The anti-apartheid movement compares to our own civil rights movement. Perhaps South Africa will be where we are today with the help of Mandela.

And where is that?

A country where minorities have rights and freedoms?

In Selma, Alabama, a Black superintendent's contract was not renewed because he supposedly lacked proper managerial skills. He was the first Black superintendent in Alabama history to be hired and fired.

It caused a massive sit-in by Black students, which shut down the entire Selma school system. While Blacks marched in support of the superintendent's reinstatement, Whites did so only to demand reopening of the schools.

An investigative report by 60 Minutes into alleged racial acts in some of New York City's top placement firms yielded even more disturbing results. An executive from Cosmopolitan (not the magazine) told his hiring staff that "if the applicant is blacker than chalkboard, they need not apply."

Is this where we are today in 1990?

This is pitiful, inexcusable and downright revolting.

True, we will never rid the world of racism, no matter how many Kings or Mandelas there are. You cannot force people to think the way we believe they should.

Education is the only way we can rid ourselves of our ignorance. Civil rights and anti-apartheid are the torch. And Martin Luther King Jr. and Nelson Mandela are the flame.

There is a dream.

And for South Africa's sake, let's hope that Mandela can make it come true.

Junkie seeks out the singles scene

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

So you can't afford a whole album, huh? Never mind — there's a wealth of singles that are worth investigating. Let's just take a peek at some of the more interesting new releases then, shall we?

DISC JUNKIE

Meat Beat Manifesto — Dog Star Man
Those crazed lads from SoHo are at it again. The rumor mill has it that a new album is set for release in mid-March, but in the meantime there is a new four-track single available for your pleasure.

Featuring the same ultra-tough hip-hopping beats with layers of fuzz, distortion and plain old screaming noise, this Meat Beat single cuts little new ground but continues to mine the old territory in a highly satisfying way.

The main difference here, is that there's much more of Jack Dangers' rapping and much less of the TV/film sample barrage. "Dog Star Man" and "dv8" both have the unstoppable Meat beat combined with frantic raps, but "Still Falling" is uncharacteristically laid back. Of course, they make the slower groove all their own by turning it into a hypnotic, enveloping sea of noise which sucks you in utterly.

Rating: Not to be missed.

Renegade Soundwave — Biting My Nails
This single is a sort of greatest hits package for Renegade Soundwave, incorporating two of their old A-sides pressed into service as filler here.

The new A-side, "Biting My Nails," is a wild '70s-meets-'80s groove with half sung/half spoken vocals. It sounds a lot like Pop Will Eat Itself, which should not surprise anyone, since the Poppies claim Soundwave as one of their mentors in their list-of-favorite-things song, "Can U Dig It?"

Anyway, you get the title track, instrumental mix of same, "Cocaine Sex," and "Kray Twins." Those last two feature sub-sonic bass and a plodding groove, which lands them somewhere between the dance floor and dub reggae. Go figure.

Rating: "Biting My Nails" is a must, the other tracks are left to the listener's discretion.

Baby Ford — Beach Bump
The CD single features six mixes of the title track, plus two versions of a song called "Wigan" and an additional track called "The World is in Love."

Fifty minutes, all told, and priced no more than a 12" vinyl single, "Beach Bump" is not quite as good as last year's "Children of the Revolution," but it still has some interesting moments.

You get a bunch of house mixes too, to keep your toes tapping. This may be a bit too far in the pop direction for some of the more attitude-oriented readers of this column, but we have it firmly filed under "guilty pleasure." Love those girlish voices cooing "voulez vous couchez ce soir?"

Rating: Optional, particularly since there's an album coming out soon with this on it.

Revolting Cocks — Let's Get Physical
This one isn't available to the general public yet, although Wax Trax has been leaking so-called "promo" copies that fetch up to $10 a piece.

In answer to the question no doubt plaguing your mind, yes, it is the same as the Olivia Newton-John number one smash of a few years ago — sort of. The lyrics are the same, but the music is new, cast in the Rev-Co "smash your face in" vein.

Currently, Newton-John's lawyers are suing to prevent the record's release. We don't have any idea why, except that maybe Olivia doesn't want her squeaky clean image soiled by a vague association with something involving "cocks." This lawsuit wasn't supposed to keep their new full-length album Beers, Steers and Queers off the shelves, but so far it has not materialized.

Thanks, Olivia.

Rating: If you can find it, it might be worth a few bucks for novelty value, but certainly not the $10 the rip-off artists would have you pay, unless you're desperately into having exotic status symbols in your record collection.

This year's Grammys: sickeningly sugary

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

"Wind Beneath My Wings" is the best song and record (What's the difference?) of 1989.

I have lost all faith in National Academy of Arts and Sciences. All they like are old dinosaur acts and harmless fluff. If any song deviates from the norm and shows creativity and social insight, the constipated Academy members are sure to shy away from it.

"Give us schlock! Give us syrup! Give us a nice safe ballad we can cry over while we watch thirtysomething!" they say at the Academy.

These are not the Grammy Awards. These are the adult contemporary Yuppie awards. The Rolling Stones should be psyched they've never won the mainstream award (a "sorry we overlooked you all these years" lifetime achievement award hardly counts).

Public Enemy somehow managed to seep through the cracks during nomination time this year and was up for best rap song for "Fight the Power." But of course, the winner was the harmless "Young MC" for the oh so profound "Bust a Move."

Out of every song nominated in every category, "Fight the Power" was by far the best of the lot. Of course, any song that fights the system that the Academy is so closely tied to could never be up for song of the year. That reward is reserved for heart tugging sugary sludge ("Wind Beneath My Wings," "The Living Years"), or songs written by upper-class White boys that try to act socially aware, but fail miserably ("The End of Innocence," "We Didn't Start the Fire").

We won't even mention the fact that "Wind Beneath My Wings," Bette Midler's saccharin infested song from her tear jerker, Beaches, is a cover song originally done by Sheena Easton.

Bonnie Raitt's Nick of Time won best album. It's not a bad pick, but the Academy likes her because she's been around awhile and won a successful battle with alcohol.

Linda Ronstadt and Aaron Neville won best duo or group pop vocal. Don Henley won best male rock vocal. Bonnie Raitt won best female rock vocal. All old, safe names. Putrid.

Traveling Wilburys won best rock duo or group, beating out the Rolling Stones, Living Colour and U2. And why not? This band is the dinosaur of dinosaur bands, with Tom Petty, Bob Dylan, George Harrison, Jeff Lynne and Roy Orbison. Of course, they got a lot more votes since Orbison's dead.

Milli Vanilli, proving that Jon Bon Jovi isn't the only person who can make a career out of having nice hair, won best new artist.

Pat Metheny won for jazz fusion and Ziggy Marley won for reggae because nobody in the Academy knows anyone else in the respective fields.

It's good to see some saving grace. Living Colour won for best rock vocal for "Cult of Personality," making it the only winning song that has any substance.

Rock is supposed to be rebel music. It should defy authority. It should try to go against the mainstream. The pro-establishment Grammys go against all that. They like it safe. They like it happy and gushy.

Congratulations Rolling Stones. Congratulations Public Enemy. By not winning any Grammys, you guys are the real winners.

The 54th Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry in a scene from Glory.

Giving credit where credit is due

By GREG ORME
Collegian Correspondent

Glory
Mt. Farms Mall Theater

Seven hundred thousand people were killed in the American Civil War, which represents over 50 percent of those who have died for this country in war. One tenth of those who fought and died on the Union side were Black Americans, mostly ex-slaves. Glory is an account of the formation of the first Black volunteer regiment.

Their heroic actions undermined Northern opposition to having Blacks in arms and helped throw open the gates of the Union Army to further concessionary regiments who, by risking their lives in battle, laid claim to emancipation and citizenship for themselves and their children. It is also the story of their commander, a privileged White Bostonian, Robert Gould Shaw (Matthew Broderick).

The central theme of the film is the development of the Black soldiers themselves. Trip, an enbittered runaway slave, brilliantly portrayed by Denzel Washington (Cry Freedom, For Queen and Country) lies at the core of this process. His smouldering resentment of the White man and his treatment as a slave is fueled by the most poignant yet jarring scene in the whole film — where he is publicly flogged for leaving the boot-camp.

Despite this, Trip and the regiment go on to become a cohesive and efficient force against obstacles set by the racist officer corps of their own army. This maturation of the Black troops is intertwined with the character of Gould.

Much of the film's narration is anchored about the authentic letters of this man. Despite his youth and relative inexperience, he is shown to be a figure of insight and true heroismm, and the growth of mutual respect between him and the troops is an essential part of the film's inspiration and beauty.

Broderick, an actor better known for his fizzier and more upbeat roles (Ferris Bueller's Day Off, Biloxi Blues) shows himself to have true scope. He superbly captures the complexity and seriousness of the character and in the earlier stages, injects just the right amount of confusion and naivete.

The motive force which keeps the film shocking and elevates it into the premier class, is the horror and verisimilitude of the battle scenes. In this department, director Edward Zwick (About Last Night) shows himself to have a brilliant and inventive flair for the lasting visual image. During the scene where Gould is forced to give the order to burn a small southern town the flames on the building behind him are skillfully arranged so as to give him a Christ-like halo. The climactic storming of Fort Wagner is handled like an emotive death-ballet, and to convey the true horror of war. I personally will never forget seeing the soldier's head explode in the earlier scenes.

The American Civil War was bloodcurdling and vicious. Glory presents an inspirational side to this carnage, by showing the true bravery of those who will charge the muzzle of a gun for an idea. It is a suitable epitaph for the Black soldier's of the 54th Regiment.

Kinney konnects

Kevn Kinney/Peter Buck
Iron Horse
Tuesday, Feb. 20

All the ponytailed, nouveau hippies looking to catch an R.E.M. show at the Iron Horse got something much different. Kevn Kinney (no "i"), frontman for another great Georgia band, Drivin 'n' Cryin', was the featured artist, though R.E.M. guitarist Peter Buck accompanied, with a little assistance from Jack Daniel's.

The show, a powerful collection of songs from Kinney's newest project, Mac Dougal Blues, and several Drvin 'n' Cryin' selections, proved why this is Kinney's tour, not Buck's. Kinney is a terrific song writer, and possesses one of the most unique voices this side of Dylan. Smoke millions of Marlboros, swallow a quart of Drano, chase it down with tequila and you get the idea.

Still, his acoustic rhythm playing and Buck's choppy Rickenbacher leads filling out the aural gaps sounds great. Sure, there's an element of the ever-popular twanginess, but Kinney goes beyond mere derivatives in creating songs that provide a familiarity in their imagery.

"Hey Landlord," which any off-campus student could easily identify with, and "Suede Shoe Blues," about a particularly irritating Arby's manager, were two examples of how Kinney is able to bring the listener closer to his own observations.

Other great moments included Kinney talking about Drivin 'n' Cryin's Bluewall show last year as he introduced the desperate "Gotta Move On," and Kinney's solo version of "Peacemaker," one of Drivin 'n' Crying's best songs.

Still, the people that came solely to hear R.E.M. songs while they searched fruitlessly for any sign of Michael Stipe, were not disappointed. The duo played "Driver 8," which Kinney wrote his own third verse for, because he "doesn't know it."

When Kinney dedicated the Rolling Stones' "I'm Free" to Nelson Mandela, he gave an honest assessment of his feelings about a most un-cut and dried situation.

Kinney and Buck also entertained the audience with a mixture of anecdotes and Buck's Keystone Kops stage demeanor.

Opening act Cindy Lee Berryhill, the next in succession of woman singer/songwriters, was less inspiring, but no less entertaining. Her songs recalled the Roches and Christine Lavin. Between songs she detailed her musical career, from writing about dinosaurs and Pompeii as a child, to driving around L.A. as a young adult. Her funniest moment was when she took a swipe at "Yuppie restaurants, where you can't afford anything." Sounds vaguely reminiscent of where she was playing.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): A little extra effort will help you get an OK for a pet project. Congratulate your mate on accomplishing something special. Family activities are favored this evneing. Be sure to include the small fry.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Certain financial goals may be unrealistic. Talk things over with your loved ones. A so-called bargain could be a gyp. You shine at a company meeting. Be prepared to move up the executive ladder.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): You are a doer and great at getting others to work hard for your causes. Go ahead and accept a loan from a well-off family member. Athletic activities are favored today.

CANCER(June21-July 22): Career moves require careful plotting. Do not push your luck too far. A financial situation will show improvement once you get better organized. Heed the advice of a more experienced friend or relative.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Do not try to rush things today. Delays will prove beneficial. A rumor may be partially true; check it out. You need to act more reserved at work. Discuss your goals with mate.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): Start out early for an important date. A transportation problem could find you running behind schedule. Look an offer over very carefully before making a final decision.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Career moves require careful planning. Avoid rushing things. A financial situation begins to show improvement. Heed the advice of an old and dear friend. Romance intensifies. Know your own heart.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Show as much concern for family members as you do for acquaintances. A strong recommendation puts you in the lead for a coveted job or appointment. Go slow in introducing changes at home.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): A grant would help you finish a special project. Recognize that a promise may not be kept. A new assignment is challenging. An unexpected check helps you pay a loan on time.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Avoid getting involved in the financial schemes of your friends or relatives. It is a waste of time to startle people with far-out ideas. Tackle essential tasks ahead of schedule to meet a deadline.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): New financial commitments are best avoided today. Creative work will prove rewarding. Romance promises to enliven you afternoon or evening. Wear something glamorous if going out tonight.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): You make an important personal decision today, giving your family greater economic security. Do not allow friends to interfere in your financial affairs. Your intuition serves you well.

Soviets students visit UMass graduate student said Gorbachev should exit from the political arena in the near future.

"He has become indecisive in the recent years," Arsenov said. "It is very difficult to call him a leader because it is difficult to understand exactly what he wants. I would like to see a new leader."

Vladimir Khodyrev, a 38-year-old computer science graduate student, said: "In the Soviet Union Gorbachev is being associated with anarchy." He added that Gorbachev is facing a political challenge from the conservative element in the government and is now in a position where he has to be constantly defended by supporters.

On the other hand, Butusov, said Gorbachev is the country's best available choice for a president.

Together at last

Many Soviet young people have been mystified by their counterparts in the United States and vice versa, the students said. For years, both sides have been yearning to meet: Americans want to see the so-called "exotic" Russians, creatures of a massive socio-economic and political experiment. Russians want to see Americans, dwellers on streets of gold "where money lies on every corner," said Yuriy Chabrov, 29, a business management graduate student.

They have come together at UMass to spend three weeks basking in friendship and goodwill, a mutual admiration society at its finest. But these groups have a gulf of difference in their cultural, political and economic experience.

According to the students, some Americans do not fully appreciate the complexities of everyday life in the Soviet Union.

Charbrov said issues such as consumer product shortages take precedence over global issues. He laughed as he recalled a question posed by a UMass student in a political science class about what both countries should do about world peace.

"This takes a backseat to other things now," he said. It would be nice for them to see a day in a life of a Soviet citizen. The transportation. A day at work, where a person may or may not work and get his 50 or a 100 rubles, which is not much considering the cost of living."

Ekaterina Gorokhova, a 22-year-old mechanical engineering student said: "I wish I could show them the hour peak in the city. Masses of people trying to get on the bus. Women carrying bags."

"Just show the reality," added Abdushelishvili. "The reality which is horrid."

Gorokhova said: "It is so annoying for me to hear things like 'Oh, it is going so well now that you have perestroika.' It should be understood that things are not going well."

According to Arsenov, many American students don't see the policy of perestroika as the Soviets see it. "There are two sides to the policy, foreign and domestic," he said. "The foreign policy is wonderful and everybody supports it. The domestic policy is far more complex, and they [students] don't know about all the repercussions, particularly the shortages of goods."

The Soviet students have some of their own preconceptions about life in the USA."What are the problems that the American students face on the daily basis?" asked Khodyrev.

Butusov replied sardonically: "Where to park a car."" "American people have less experience in suffering," he said. Abdushelishvili added, grinning: "Suffering here is only sentimental."

UMass student Phil Johnson who has spent a significant amount of time with the visiting students, said the notion of suffering could be associated with some elements in the American life.

"Yes, we can go to Stop and Shop at 2 a.m. in the morning if we want to," he said. "There are no lines. It is just a matter of having a car and going there. But that is not true for everybody. They [students] have not seen the inner city of Boston. They are not seeing a true representation either."

The Soviet students unanimously agreed that the standard of living in the United States is much higher than they envisioned. They also did not expect to be received with so much warmth and kindness as they have been by the UMass students.

"We are so pleased, surprised and delighted with how they have received us," Abdushelishvili said.

Gorokhova said: "Especially those in the Russian club and those who have been in the Soviet Union."

There were many memorable events during their visit to the U.S., the students said. But the Stop and Shop supermarket seems to have evoked a higher string of emotions.

Abdushelishvili had a strong response to seeing products in such plentitude. "I thought that it wasn't fair what was happening in the Soviet Union," he said. "I remembered our stores, our lines, our women who don't even look like women because of those lines. I remembered my wife."

Some students said they would like to come back to the United States for a visit. Gorokhova said she would like to come back here for six months and travel in the South. Khodyrev said he would like to visit the U.S. on a monthly basis.

But others are more reluctant to plan a second visit."Frankly I would like to get back to familiar surroundings," said Charbov.

"I would like to come back one day, but not too soon and not for too long," said Butusov. "I am a patriot. I want to go and try to change things. Russians deserve a better destiny."

for 5,000.

Chip Mitchell and Kevin Walters are the Minutemen's only double event entries. Mitchell will run the 60-yard dash along with Walters and go solo in the hurdles. Walters will also run the 200.

Joe Edgerton will be the Minutemen's lone weight man as he should be in the thick of the top throwers if he can match his season-best shot put heave of 49-2.

Although O'Brien is realistic about where his team can finish, he also realizes the unpredictable past that New Englands has.

"This meet is filled with surprises," said O'Brien. "One-tenth of a second in one race could mean a few places in the team finishes. It's like a tourney, anything can happen."

so, the UMass sophomore's 54.1 was an impressive effort.

"That (the Temple meet) was my best performance ever," Booker said. "Still, I have a lot of room for improvement – mainly on pommel horse and parallel bars."

Like Booker, the Minutemen need to improve as a team if they want to end the regular season successfully against Army, Springfield, and Syracuse – three EIGL opponents.

"We were just off [against Temple] – it was a rough meet," Booker said. "We have to be a little more consistent, through doing more quality routines in practice.

"We're starting to [do more practice routines]. After the Temple meet, I realized I could do better," continued Booker. "People [on the team] were upset when they saw how badly we lost against Temple – we realized we have to get our act together."

"It's been a weird week; our enthusiasm has been low after the Temple loss," senior co-captain John Eggers said. "We have to put people together and gain momentum as a team, not just as individuals."

With three regular season meets to go before the New England Championships on March 10, the Minutemen will have to prove themselves soon. For the time being, they'll have to concentrate on not getting bayonetted against Army.

"We're going in there to win," Booker said.

honor aspect of the race aside, and swim to win, or at least score.

"I think each one of them [the four UMass swimmers] has a chance of scoring which would be great for them, great for the whole program, great for the team," Newcomb said.

Cruz and Leary will swim the 50-yard freestyle, in what could be Leary's only realistic chance of qualifying for the Nationals. Schwarz will swim the 200-yard and Young will race in the 500-yard to round out the first day of swimming.

Day two, Schwarz takes center stage as she ventures into the 100-yard butterfly while her teammates sit and wait for the final day. Cruz and Leary race in the 100-yard freestyle and Young races in the 1650-yard free.

For one long stretch of three days these four Minutewomen bond to represent UMass in a very prestigious competition. For three the season will end, and unless Leary qualifies for the Nationals, the end of an era will fall sadly upon the women's swim team.

Wednesday vs. St. Joe's at the Cage) and George Washington wins both (at Temple and vs. Rhode Island). That's the easy part.

Now, for moving up in the world. To finish third a whole lotta things have to happen. IF (insert loud wood-knocking type noises here), West Virginia loses twice, Rutgers beats Rhody tomorrow, and then next week we get St. Bonaventure over Rutgers, George Washington over Rhode Island, and Temple over Rutgers – UMass is guaranteed at least a three-way tie with Rhody and Rutgers (maybe West Virginia, too) for third at 10-8.

In a tiebreaker, the first criterion is head-to-head. UMass wins because, of all the teams tied, everyone split with each other except UMass and Rhody. UMass swept, and that gives them the edge. In any tie that involves URI, UMass wins.

Repeat after us: "The key is Rhode Island."

Therefore, UMass and Rhode Island must be tied. If a team like Rutgers or West Virginia pulls way ahead, then UMass will settle for fourth or fifth. Likewise, if either of those teams go in the tank and finish 9-9 (the worst any of those three can wind up), UMass would slip ahead. Got it?

Remember, "The key is Rhode Island." End of today's lesson.

Progress made in lockout bargaining

NEW YORK (AP) – Just when baseball's labor situation seemed bleakest, owners turned around yesterday and withdrew the proposals that caused outrage among players a day earlier.

Union chief Donald Fehr said the new plan showed substantial progress, and the sides will meet again today, a day after his deadline to break off talks if there had been no movement.

"I'm as confused about the way thing have been changing as I'm sure you are," Fehr told reporters after a one-hour meeting with Commissioner Fay Vincent. "They've come a substantial way; there's a long way to go."

Vincent said the proposal "was merely a straightforward invitation to solve this."

"I think the [owners] made a very significant decision to solve this in the near term," he said.

As the spring training lockout began its second week, owners presented a plan that is slightly better for players than the current contract.

higher times entered for that category, said LaFreniere.

"Rhode Island will be tough competition in field events," said LaFreniere. "They have more depth, a larger, scholarship-riding team."

Final heats for Saturday's events will be run Sunday. On Sunday trials and finals for the 3000-meter will be run by Laura LaVallee. No trials will be held for the relays. Competing in finals for the 4x400-meter are Muccini, Dana Smith, Lennice Johnson and Ambrose. The 4x800-meter team will lead off with Meldrim, Cathy Crocker, Shana Smith and Becky Johnson as anchor.

Minutemen set to face Bonnies

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow, the University of Massachusetts men's hoop team travels to Olean, N.Y. to face St. Bonaventure University (7:35 p.m.), in what could be the beginning to an interesting week in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

The two teams clashed already this season, back on Jan. 15. The Minutemen won that game with ease, 82-55 at the Curry Hicks Cage, at the time the team's sixth straight win.

Things are different now. UMass has come back to Earth, a more modest 13-12 overall and 8-8 in the A-10. The Bonnies are still stuck in the mud, a hapless 3-12 in the conference and 8-16 overall (before last night's tilt at Rhode Island). But they have been showing signs of life, such as last Saturday's 81-70 win over West Virginia at the Reilly Center.

Leading the way for the Bonnies are guards Michael Burnett (13.8 points, 4.7 rebounds per game) and Rob Lanier (nephew of Bob, scoring at a 10.8 per game clip).

For UMass, no one has been hotter than sophomore William Herndon, who is averaging better than 25 points in his last four games. Meanwhile, sophomore Jim McCoy still continues at his 20.8 ppg pace, third in the A-10.

Stuff: And now, on to the subject that a lot of people have been asking about. Allow the record to be set straight here and now — where UMass can still finish in the A-10, and why:

This may sound odd, but UMass could finish with a losing record, and could just as easily finish in third place.

First things first. The Minutemen could finish as low as seventh, if they lose both remaining games (tomorrow. and

Senior Helen Freeman scored 31 points, including the 1,000th of her career, but the Minutewomen fell to Duquesne, 72-60 last night in Pittsburgh.

Freeman gets 1,000th point, but Duquesne wins, 72-60

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The bad news for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team last night was that it lost to Duquesne 72-60 at the A.J. Palumbo Center in Pittsburgh. With the loss the Minutewomen drop to 4-21, 1-15 in the Atlantic 10.

But there was a bit of good news for UMass last night. Senior center Helen Freeman scored 31 points to put her over the 1,000 point mark in her career. She becomes only the fifth woman in UMass history to break the 1,000-point barrier. For her career she now has 1,028 points, which places fourth on the career scoring list.

She hit the 1,000 mark early in the first half as she scored an inside bucket and was fouled on the play. She calmly stepped to the line and hit the free throw which gave her the magic number.

"She played outstanding," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt.

"She really made things happen out there for us.

"I'm tickled to death [about her breaking the 1,000 point mark]. She's been here as the program has grown. It's a great tribute to her and also to her teammates. They are the ones who get her the ball."

UMass took a 39-35 lead into the locker room at halftime.

They held a lead until the 9:34 mark when Darcie Vincent (24 points) buried a trey to put the Duchesses up 53-50. It was a lead that Duquesne would never surrender.

Vincent did not shoot the ball well (5-for-20) but managed to find her way to the line 16 times, making good on 14 of those attempts.

"She's a good three-point shooter," said Hewelt, "and they were isolating her one-on-one on the wing. She'd fake the shot and put it on the floor and get the foul."

Speaking of three-pointers Sue Serafini was once again on the mark last night. She was 4-for-8 from behind the line, scoring all 12 of her points that way.

Following Serafini in the scoring department was Kim Kristofik. The freshman received her first start of the season (in place of Lisa Hair) and scored eight points.

Track teams prepare for New Englands

• Women eager to face UConn challenge

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Turning into the final leg of an impressive season, the University of Massachusetts women's track team heads to Boston University's Commonwealth Armory this weekend to compete in the New England Championships.

Touting the fastest track in New England, Boston University, along with Connecticut, Povidence College, Northeastern and Rhode Island promise UMass strong and diligent competition.

"I'm very optimistic. We've got a nice, tight team, quality kids," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "Just about everyone qualified. We're pleased with what we've done. Now we have to go down and score some points."

One team member not able to compete will be Jen Piccioli, still suffering from tendonitis of the patella. She qualified for the 55-meter dash and the triple jump.

On Saturday both the trials and finals will be held for field events. Rachel Castriotta and Tina White will throw the 20-pound weight.

Also competing Saturday: LeeAnn Ambrose (400-meter), Julie Muccini and Lennice Johnson (600-meter), Becky Johnson (1000-yard), Shana Smith and Maureem Meldrim (1500-meter), and Sue McFayden (55-meter).

Ambrose holds one of the top three times in New England for that event and teammate Becky Johnson also has one of the

• Minutemen setting sights on Top 10 finish

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team will venture to MIT this weekend with hopes of finishing in the "second five" at the New England indoor track and field championships.

With the first seven spots seemingly already sewn up, the Minutemen should do battle with the University of Maine and New Hampshire for the remaining Top 10 vacancies.

Boston University, Northeastern, and the University of Connecticut are the heavy pre-meet favorites.

"We'll need season-best performances across the board," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien. "We don't have the firepower to deal with the top five, but if we can get scoring from our 10 needed events we should be right in that second five."

The best chance for a UMass first place finish will be in the legs of Steve Brown in the 400 meters. Brown, who was fifth in last year's New Englands, has been steadily improving since then. He has a season best of 49.42.

Garfield Vaughn, who has run 50.1, could be a threat as well.

Jerome Bledsoe, Art Smith and Gerry Squires are UMass' only other returning NE Championship point scorers.

Bledsoe and Smith placed fifth, while Squires was third. Bledsoe has soared 22-7 in the long jump with Smith running 8:27 in the 3,000. Squires has run around 8:40

Men's gymnastics to battle Army

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will try to avoid getting shot down when they travel to West Point to do battle with Army on Saturday. The Minutemen (5-4, 2-2 in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League), are coming off a 273-255 stinging at the hands of Temple last Sunday.

Although Army's record is 10-2, Saturday's matchup will probably be closer than the team's respective records would indicate.

"Army is very, very similar to us," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. 'This may be our closest meet of the year — both teams have been scoring in the low 260s."

The Cadet's high score for the season has been 264.7 in a loss to powerful Navy, while the Minutemen hit 262 in a recent win over Southern Connecticut.

Past history also indicates that an exciting competition might be in the making. Two years ago, UMass and Army were tied at 217 entering the final event, the horizontal bar, before the Minutemen prevailed to win by two points.

Last year, UMass beat Army 265-256 on their way to taking first in a tri-meet against Army and Air Force.

The Cadets' success relies mainly upon the efforts of their two top all-around performers, senior captain Scott Curtis and freshman Marco Rosito of Topeka, Kan.

Although UMass struggled against Temple and has generally been unable to emulate the form that brought a 9-2 record last season, Johnson sees some encouraging signs for his team.

"Against Temple, our ring team did really well, and [sophomore] Cal Booker's performance on floor [a school record 9.7] and all-around was encouraging," Johnson said.

Booker was outshined in the Temple meet by sophomore Bill Roth, who justified his rating as the top all-arounder in the nation by scoring a 56.3. Even

Swimmers at Eastern meet

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

After a successful weekend in Rhode Island, four of the University of Massachusetts women's swimmers have advanced to compete in the Eastern Championships to be held at the University of Pennsylvania, through Sunday.

Michele Leary, Keira Cruz, Laurie Schwarz and Tracy Young all treked to the city of Brotherly Love. "We go from a team concept to a very individual performance," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb.

"What we're really looking for are quality swims," Newcomb said. "We're talking about one of the top conference meets in the country and to go to this meet is an honor."

True it may be an honor to compete in this meet, but when the swimmers take to the water, they will put the

Administration meets second of GEO's concerns

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

In its struggle to prevent a Graduate Employee Organization strike on Thursday, the University administration decided to provide Research Assistants with fee waivers if they qualify for financial aid, Provost O'Brien said yesterday.

"Out of the three concerns expressed by the GEO, [the University] has met two," O'Brien said.

The GEO broke off negotiations with the University on Feb. 14 after the University refused to recognize its affiliation with the United Auto Workers Union/District 65.

On Feb. 15, the GEO voted to endorse a strike and one-day work stoppage for Thursday.

O'Brien said a letter will be issued to the GEO leadership today stating University action in the event of a strike.

Mark Kenen, a GEO coordinating committee member, said the RA fee waivers represent a "tremendous victory" for the graduate employees, but it is not enough.

UMass teams with Digital in project

Corporation to provide $4.5 million for computer system

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts and Digital Equipment Corp. have announced plans for a $6 million, three-year project which seeks to break down barriers between different computer systems and create a network that is easily accessible.

The testing ground for the plan, dubbed "Project Pilgrim," will be in the College of Engineering and the Computer and Information Science (COINS) department, where approximately 500 workstations and 40 multi-users systems ultimately will be accessible to students, faculty and researchers.

"It's not a laboratory experiment," said Jack McCredie, director of Digital's External Research Program, in an interview last week. "You're building something that everybody's going to use.

UMass was targeted for the project because it is seeking to tie together its varied computer systems to increase the information flow on campus, McCredie said.

"You are very interested in exploring a lot of these networking issues," McCredie said. "We don't try to get involved in projects where we push them on a school."

Digital will provide $4.5 million for the project and a professional engineer who will work with University researchers. Research overhead from UMass will absorb the remaining $1.5 million, according to University officials.

The project is a spinoff of Project Athena, a collaboration between Digital and IBM begun in 1983 at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Researchers from Digital and M.I.T. worked to produce numerous unforeseen technologies to enhance educational techniques, one of which include the "X window" system, which allows information from one computer to be displayed on another.

UMass also was chosen because of its close proximity to DEC's Maynard headquarters and its commitment to research, McCredie said. UMass is the largest public research university in New England.

Charles Wilson, program manager for the project, said equipment for the project is due to begin arriving at the University in 30 to 60 days. He said plans for the project have been in the works for the past year and a half.

"Basically what we're trying to do is enhance Project Athena," he said. "We want to take what was learned at Athena and move it to another university and build on it."

Wilson said another goal of the project is to increase security by installing a "central access control" so that computers are easily accessible only by those who are authorized to use them.

UM student organizing trip to China

By RUSSELL SKELTON
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts graduate student Matthew Huang is working to organize the first delegation of Chinese students to return to China since the June 4 massacre in Beijing.

Although he is fearful of possible repercussions for his support of the pro-democracy movement, Huang is organizing a delegation of 10 members who will be elected from eight regions throughout the United States.

He said he is hopeful the delegation will be allowed to visit before the Asian Games in Beijing this fall.

"[We] want interaction and communication with the current government," said Huang, 27, who left his parents and older sister behind in Shanghai in 1986 to enroll at UMass where he is now a doctoral candidate in molecular and cellular biology.

He is a member of the supervisory committee of the Independent Federation of Chinese Students and Scholars in the United States (IFCSS), a Washington, D.C. based organization which is spearheading the project. IFCSS represents about 25,000 of the 40,000 Chinese students in the United States at about 200 educational institutes.

Huang, like many other Chinese students in the United States, faces a grave predicament, however because the possible consequences of returning include being imprisoned.

Huang said the motivation behind the delegation is to launch a high-profile visit and to open the door to further exchanges and reform policies, including the release of political prisoners.

The IFCSS would like to include on the trip's itinerary meetings with government officials and imprisoned dissidents, he said. He hopes the delegation also will be allowed to visit fellow students and teachers as well as family and friends.

IFCSS officials first requested a visit Feb. 7 when two short letters were submitted to the Chinese Embassy in Washington D.C.

When asked Friday about the status of the request, Third Secretary of the Embassy press office, Zhu Toaying, said: "We don't recognize this so-called organization."

Huang said Chinese officials have displayed hostility toward pro-democracy Chinese activists in the United States. He said Chinese officials photographed and videotaped pro-democracy activists at an anti-government rally outside the Chinese Embassy on Oct. 1, 1989, which marked Communist China's national day and the 40th anniversary of the revolution.

Huang said although the outlook is not bright, "We can't just sit and do nothing. We have to try something."

Although the IFCSS is willing to compromise to be allowed to return, Huang emphasized that some things are non-negotiable.

Cesar Chavez to promote pesticide awareness

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Cesar Chavez, president and founder of the United Farm Workers of America, is scheduled to speak on Friday at noon in the Student Union Ballroom to promote awareness of the dangers of pesticides to farmworkers and consumers.

Chavez, who has led two successful table grape boycotts in the 1960s and 1970s, is currently leading a third international grape boycott, titled "The Wrath of Grapes."

The boycott, began in July 1984, focuses on both the dangers to vineyard workers exposed to pesticides and the subsequent residue of pesticides on food received by consumers.

Chavez has called on the supermarket industry to take responsibility for the food they sell and not to carry California table grapes, which according to the UFW is sprayed with more pesticides than any other crop.

Chavez is stepping up calls for action since a childhood cancer cluster was discovered in Earlimart, California, a table grape growing town, and a farmworker recently died from exposure to the pesticide, Parathion.

"Farm workers will never again be treated like agricultural implements to be used and discarded," Chavez said recently.

"We have tasted freedom and dignity and we will fight to the end before we give it up," he said. "We have come too far and we have too much further to go to give up now."

The UMass chapter of MassPIRG is spearheading the fundraising effort for the visit. The Commuter Area Government and all unions on campus have pledged money and the Distinguished Visitors Program, the Chancellor's Office and the Graduate Student Senate are also expected to pledge financial support, according to Bonnie Simmons, a member of MassPIRG.

Chavez is also scheduled to speak at University of Massachusetts at Boston, Boston University, Boston College, Assumption College, Williams College and Amherst College.

UMass buys Hadley farm

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

After nearly two months of negotiation, the University of Massachusetts purchased the 131-acre Young Meadow horse farm in Hadley for $1.5 million Thursday.

The farm, located on the western side of campus on North Maple Street, will become University property on March 9, said Thomas Trotman, executive director of the University of Massachusetts Foundation.

■ fee waivers

"The only reason [the administration] is giving fee waivers is because of the threat of our strike," he said. "This just shows the power of the organization."

Chastising Duffey for what he called "squirming his way out" of the issue, Kenen said the University is not legally prevented from recognizing the GEO as a union.

The Board of Regents can delegate the power to recognize a union to the chancellor, he said.

Duffey refuted the GEO argument, stating that the University has recognized the GEO as a negotiating body with which the University can discuss "matters of employment" and sign written statements with.

"The Board of Regents has never delegated the power to recognize a union at a campus level," he said. "[The GEO] has to negotiate with the state, not the campus."

Trotman said the Foundation will pay for the property with private funds and bond money that was previously allocated to build animal facilities that will be displaced when the Mullens Convocation Center is built on campus.

Roger Hewett, director of planned giving and a member of the Foundation's real estate committee, predicted that the farm will be operational and ready for student use this coming fall semester despite the problems it has had with its sewage system.

"There is a great deal of work to be done," he said. "We still have to construct a whole new sewage system."

If the University cannot get a new sewage system in place by April 18, when the animals currently in the barns at the Mullens site have to leave, Trotman said the University will have to go to the Environmental Protection Agency to ask if the animals may reside at the farm while the system is being installed.

Hewett said the University's 50 horses, currently in the Tilson Farm, will be moved to the new facility where an indoor riding facility will be built.

He added that the farm will "unquestionably help" the University achieve preeminence in the agricultural field.

Duffey's peers support new role

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Duffey's reluctant acceptance of the dual role of president and chancellor last Thursday, while garnering much support from University of Massachusetts administrators, will force them to shoulder additional duties.

Duffey was selected by the board of trustees to replace President David C. Knapp who will officially step down from his post on March 17. He will oversee the Amherst, Worcester and Boston campuses of the University and receive a salary increase from his present $108,999 to $130,000.

Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson said that Duffey's acceptance was "both the right thing to do and a valuable idea for the University."

"The University needs a strong spokesperson for public higher education," he said. "In a political sense, he is uniquely qualified."

Madson said while there is an expectation that administrators will play a greater role in running the University, Provost O'Brien will have increased responsibilities.

O'Brien said he does not anticipate any "dramatic changes" in the University administration, but realizes he will have to pick up some of the Chancellor's work.

Ricardo Townes, dean of students, said when he found out that Duffey had accepted Knapp's position, he had "empathy" for him.

"I'm a Joe Duffey fan," he said, "And with this enormous burden on him, I wish him much luck."

Townes said the new position will comfort people. "It is a signal that the Chancellor will be here for awhile and is not out looking for another job," he said.

Duffey acceded that his additional responsibilities as president will be "difficult and won't be very easy for my associates either."

O'Brien said the merging of the two positions will greatly change the function of the presidency on the three campuses.

Because the campuses will deal with the Board of Regents more directly, the "complicated superstructure of power" will be decentralized and bring more autonomy to each campus, he said.

Though he said he did not want the presidency abolished, O'Brien said he hopes the University president will someday coordinate a loose coalition of associate presidents from the Amherst, Worcester and Boston campuses.

"In the years ahead, [the merging of the presidency and the chancellorship] will enable the campuses to make more decisions on our own, without all of the red tape," he said.

Department of Defense trial resumes

The trial of four men arrested at the University of Massachusetts last spring for protesting Department of Defense funded military research on campus will resume today at the Northampton District courthouse at 10 a.m..

The jury will go into deliberations today after hearing closing remarks from John Langford of Amherst, Jay Allain, of Florence, Jonathan Leavitt of Amherst, and Randy Viscio of Hampshire College last Friday.

The jury was reminded by the prosecutor, Northwestern District Attorney Frederick Bartmon, that the necessity defense had been thrown out and they were to present a verdict based specifically upon what the four stand accused of. Langford, Allain, and Leavitt, are all charged with trespassing, and Viscio is charged with disorderly conduct.

The necessity or "competing harms" defense was discarded by Judge Shea two weeks ago because of a lack of evidence.

Allain said he reminded the jury, in his closing statement of a statement made by Martin Luther King Jr. when he was jailed for protests in Alabama.

"Dr. King was accused of causing tension. He said the tension was already present, he just brought it to the surface," Allain said.

Students for financial aid lobby in D.C.

By MIKE WESTER
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — A few minutes after midnight Saturday, University of Massachusetts football coach Jim Reid stepped on to a chartered bus, bound for Washington, D.C. The jam-packed interior hushed its murmerings when Reid began to speak.

"You folks represent a great institution — a class institution — and that's the way you have to dress, that's the way you have to work, and that's the way you have to perform," he said.

His pep talk went on, ending with a rousing round of applause and cheers. But unlike the group Reid ordinarily addresses, these students are not off to represent UMass on the gridiron. These students are representing UMass, and students across the nation, on Capitol Hill in Washington as they lobby for increased federal financial aid.

The UMass student group SAFA — or Students Advocating Financial Aid — rode through the pre-dawn hours to arrive in the nation's capital yesterday en route to a three-day lobbying effort.

The group's central aims are to inform senators and congressmen and their legislative aids of how cuts in financial aid hurt students. This is SAFA's 11th annual trip to Washington, D.C.

Today, their ensemble of 34 students and three UMass administrators is splitting into 10 groups to conduct interviews with legislators. They have spent the last two months arranging these interviews.

Rob Skiba, the vice-president of SAFA, said that the lobbying effort is bound for success. He said that the group already has set 68 appointments and has tentative commitments for many others.

Referendum could increase monies

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

If a referendum question is approved to appear on the March 13 ballot for student trustee and Undergraduate Student Senate president, students will vote to increase monies allocated to area governments from the Student Activities Trust Fund from $9.60 to $20 per person, causing a potential 30 to 40 percent cut to the Registered Student Organization system, said SGA Treasurer Laura Filkins.

To maintain the amount of money available to RSOs there would have to be a cut from some other area of the SATF, Filkins said.

"The only place they could possibly get it from would be the funds made available to the Student Activities Office, which falls under the jurisdiction of the vice chancellor's office," said SGA Speaker John Dunlap. "And only they can dictate the budget for the [Student Activities Office]."

"When the SATF was put into students hands, it was contingent upon whether there was an SAO. It is not possible for these people to propose a cut from the monies available to the RSOs through the SAO," said Dunlap.

There are three ways in which a referendum question can appear on the ballot: by a majority of the area govenment presidents and senators, by two-thirds of the senate, or with 10 percent of undergraduate support.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, Dennis Madson, said: "It should not be an option to cut from the SAO, therefore

Student employee comes clean

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The 21-year-old male student who was injured last Tuesday when he went through the dishwasher at the Worcester Dining Commons said the accident was a result of a "joke."

Nathan Tweedy, a resident of Hamlin Residence Hall, was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton and was treated for first, second and third degree burns. He was released Wednesday in fair condition.

"We were just fooling around," he said. "It was a joke."

Tweedy said the pumps that feed water into the dishwasher were not on when he climbed onto the moving conveyor belt, which carries dishes into the 19-foot dishwasher.

He said he thought the water pumps would not turn on but when a switch is hit in the dishwasher the pumps are activated.

"I hit the switch," he said.

Tweedy received burns on his face, hands, and a portion of his chest and back.

"You know how when you're a kid and you're fooling around, it was that sort of thing," he said. "It was like when you jump out of a window, it was just like that."

Shirley Stafford, Worcester Dining Commons director, said in the twenty-five to thirty years the University has been operating the dishwasher no accidents have occurred.

Stafford said Tweedy, when he returns to the D.C., will work in whatever position he is needed, even the dishroom.

"He is probably the safest person ever to put back in the dishroom," she said.

Nicaraguan voters make history

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The Nicaraguan election results will have serious ramifications for both the self-determination of the Third World and the future of U.S. policy towards the Sandinistas, an activist for Central American issues said yesterday.

Mike Clark, the regional coordinator for New England Witness for Peace lectured on 'What's at Stake Today in Nicaragua' to an audience of about 20 people at the Unitarian Universalist Society at Amherst.

The WFP is a "grass-roots, faith-based movement committed to changing U.S. policy toward Central America through non-violent action." Clark has traveled to Nicaragua four times since 1983 as a WFP long term volunteer.

"All this weekend, we can say that history is being made by the people of Nicaragua," Clark said. "They are voting for their right to self-determination. The stakes are high."

Yesterday was the official voting day in Nicaragua to determine the presidency, vice presidency, and members of the National Assembly. Election monitors from the United Nations and the Organization of American States have been observing the elections since voter registration began in April. They will determine whether or not the Sandinista government has sponsored a fair election.

"If the international community accepts the validity of the election, then they will begin to talk and pressure the U.S. government to change it's policy," Clark said.

If the election is judged as being fair, Clark said that U.S. policy towards Nicaragua — such as aid to the contras and the trade embargo- will no longer be tolerated by the international community. He said that he understood as well as U.S. policy leaders that Nicaragua is "the litmus test of U.S. policy in Central America."

"What happens or what doesn't happen in our policy towards Nicaragua has implications for the rest of the Third World," Clark said.

Clark said that he thought that the Sandinistas would win the majority of Sunday's votes and also get international recognition for conducting a fair election tomorrow.

"Nicaraguans will take responsibility for their actions tomorrow and the U.S. will take responsibility for their actions after," Clark said. "If this happens, it will be a defeat of a policy which has been consistently serious and brutal for the last ten years."

Clark said that later this week will be the most crucial time for U.S. citizens to lobby Congress to respect the election outcome, to end the embargo, and to demobilize the contras.

"What we as a movement do this week could be more important as what we have done in the last five years," Clark said.

The American Friends Service Committee has organized National Call-in Days to Congress to urge Congressman Conte to change U.S. policy towards Nicaragua on Feb. 28 and March 1.

ALMOST BARREN—A solitary torii stands in an empty field on Route 63.

Half the world is hungry for your experience.

Around the world an estimated 800 million people are hungry or starving. And many more that do have food to eat, need a more balanced diet. They could eat. With your help.

If you have an agriculture degree or farming experience, your knowledge of crop development, plant protection, soil science, animal husbandry or agricultural economics is needed. As a Peace Corps volunteer, you could help close the food gap, working in developing countries to give people the skills they need to grow their own food.

It's one of many projects in more than sixty countries where Peace Corps volunteers are sharing their skills with others to make life better. And it's a unique opportunity to discover the world, and broaden your own capabilities with some real experience. At a professional level.

Whatever your degree or field of experience, talk to UMASS's Peace Corps reps, 12 Draper Hall, 545-2105. Call today or stop by the film showing, at 7:30 pm, February 27 in 124 Draper Hall.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Rhetoric lacks concerns

In the face of the Graduate Employees Organization's threat of work stoppage on March 1, the confrontation between the "union" and the administration has been brought to an accelerated head.

Eric K. Findeis

But this is not the only facet of tension underlying the GEO push for legitimacy.

There remains no mandate in the graduate student population concerning the GEO/District 65/UAW bid.

I do recognize significant problems in the relationship between the University and their amorphous student-teacher-researcher definition for graduate students.

Fees are onerous, support is poor and health benefits are mythical. But I do not support the GEO, and many graduate students share my feelings.

It is easy to be caught up in the rhetoric. But rhetoric does not address issues and concerns.

The GEO, in its too focused frenzy for collective bargaining, has not paused to consider what it will do if it gains recognition.

The GEO should not simply assume that graduate students support it.

Graduate students want to know where the GEO stands on many issues like health care, daycare, equity in wages and responsibilities among TAs, TOs and RAs, and especially who will be paying for all this. I don't hear anything about these important issues.

Maybe I would be a supporter if the GEO had a platform beyond "we demand to negotiate."

The GEO is upset that they could not get a meeting with the Chancellor. Dare I try to remember who cut off negotiations in the first place?

I don't find the administration's stance irresponsible.

Requirement of the GEO to not participate in work stoppages, slowdowns or strikes would be a requirement for a union contract anyway. Consider the bad taste shown when a group of educators walks out on students who need their guidance.

There are at least two prevalent opinions among my colleagues. The first is that we all knew what we were getting into when we came to this University. And so it seems inexcusable to complain, threaten, and indeed, strike now.

The second stems from the maxim that graduate students shouldn't be here long enough or have enough free time to realize their condition.

A fellow graduate student once noted that he was working too hard on his degree to waste time striking.

The mission of being a graduate student has been transmogrified from our avowed goals of education to a desire for a comfortable, and yes, guaranteed lifestyle.

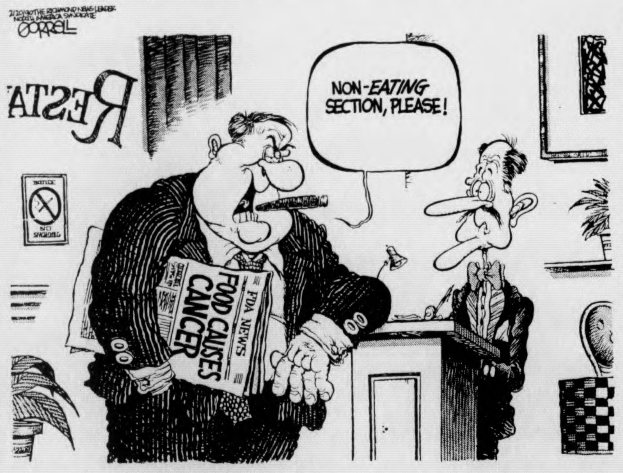
Recognize that the University is in a state of financial crisis, and the budget horizon promises more cutbacks. Not many administrations would have pledged to support graduate employees the way ours has. Not many would have sought aid to counter the fee hikes.

If this were happening during the fiscal wrangle of the 1970s, we wouldn't be waiting for the ax to fall — we would have been long gone.

In this atmosphere of doom, pushing toward confrontation the way the GEO has does not serve our cause.

Graduate students should work with the University and the undergraduates to protect our educational system, not betray it.

Eric K. Findeis is a UMass graduate student



Undergraduates can play a part

This letter is directed to the undergraduate students. You are footing a sizeable bill (getting larger all the time) to get a quality education, and I feel you deserve an explanation for some of the events that will soon affect your lives.

On March 1st, along with most other graduate assistants, I will not teach the class I am under contract to teach. Beyond the legal obligations to fulfill the terms of my contract, I am having a hard time stomaching the notion that I could possibly hurt the people I teach.

Some of my peers, people who are also furious over the treatment that we are receiving, are so distraught over this possibility that they cannot bring themselves to stop work, even for a day. I respect that.

You may think that by pursuing the right to collective bargaining and relief from pay cuts I succeed only in depriving you of your education. You may be angry.

I can only respond by pleading with you to understand the position we are in. Many of us are trying to support ourselves on poverty-level wages with little or no job security. Although we are also here to get an education, we spend a large proportion of our time doing highly skilled labor (teaching, research, etc.) It seems only fair that we should at least be paid a liveable wage and have some guarantee that we will be back for another semester.

You may still be angry. You should be. Your education is being compromised. Not by your graduate assistants, but by the administration.

The University administration is trying to take advantage of our strong commitment to you and the faculty to force us to back down.

Demand that they settle this dispute in a fair and equitable manner so we can concentrate on doing what we do best, helping you get the education we pay for.

Barry Braun
Graduate Assistant

Million dollar dreams

There comes a point in the English major's life — three months before graduation — when he must examine his conscience and determine whether or not he's made the right career decisions, if any at all, during the past four years.

Bob Bobala

Hours of evaluation ultimately lead to only one question, and the English major, alone in his room and wishing he had enough money to order a pizza, must summon all his courage to ask himself: Could I have been a professional athlete?

For me, the answer comes easily. No. I couldn't have been a professional athlete. I just don't have the talent — not even in wiffle ball. The self-evaluation can end.

A wave of contentment washes through my body. But it only lasts a few seconds. An unexpected thought slips out. A dismal thought.

Sports management.

No. Stop! I'm perfectly happy with what I decided to study.

Sports management. You blew it. You could have been rich.

It's an evil thought, but one I can't deny. Baseball player Will Clark, the four million dollar man, is being paid that much a year by management. Larry Bird will be paid $6 million in the 1990-91 basketball season. Sugar Ray Leonard, $17 million, easy, from his fight with Roberto Duran in 1989. All paid by management — management that can easily afford it. And I'm an English major.

I could condemn this warped society that gives astronomical amounts of money to men, and some women, who play games for a living. But I'm the one who makes the trips to Fenway Park. I'm the one who's in front of the tube on Sundays before Bob Costas even gets on the air. I'm the one who hunted for somebody who had the Tyson-Douglas fight on videotape so I could see it. I'm the one handing my money over to these people. And I didn't major in sports management. Rats.

The National Hockey League's gross revenues were about $100 million in 1980. Last year they were $330 million. In the same ten years, the National Basketball Association's gross revenues went from $110 million to $370 million. But that's peanuts, kids.

The National Football League went from $415 million to $1.1 billion. And major league baseball went from $350 million to $1.1 billion. Billions and billions and billions.

The sickest thing on earth this month has got to be how the baseball owners locked out their players from spring training camps. The owners aren't happy. How can they not be happy? They're making millions of dollars off a game!

I'd be happy if I were making millions of dollars off a game!

Although paid attendance at sporting events is at an all-time high, it's for television that these salary-inebriated athletes should buy a drink. CBS, for example, will give baseball $1.1 billion over the next four years. The NBA just negotiated a four-year $600 million contract with NBC. Even the lowly NHL is cashing in with a $51 million deal with SportsChannel America.

The money keeps coming and the owners and athletes keep running — straight to the bank. Wayne Gretzky's worth $2 million a year. John Elway, almost as much. Rickey Henderson, $3 million. Billions and billions and billions. I want to manage these people.

Sports management. The English major's secret dream.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

I am really ticked off at my bank, Heritage NIS. I received a letter on Saturday informing me that, as of April 1, 1990, I will be charged 50 cents per transaction every time I use an ATM (money machine).

This isn't every time I use another bank's ATM, or make too many withdrawals in a certain time period. Nooo, this is every time on Friday nights, when I finally get to a machine to deposit my check and I get this blasted charge. Of course, I will want cash, too, so I'll get another charge for that. And if I want to know my account balances, that's a third one. Thus, just to do all this, I have to pay $1.50. Now if that ain't a problem. . .

Yet wait, there is a solution! Unlike a woman whom I met at an ATM who suggested that we blow up the bank, I have an alternative solution. I am going down there today and pulling out every cent I have and going to another bank.

Now I realize that my mere pittance of a savings won't topple such a powerful bank. But maybe if a whole bunch of the customers do the same, maybe they will get a clue that they can't charge outrageous sums of money for the privilege of keeping our money. Of course, by the time they get that clue, I will be long gone.

So what do you think of our football team's $1.16 million budget being offset by $77,000 in ticket revenues, not to mention that other sports teams are being slashed? Just something to wonder about.

Peter Leon

The talk about reunifing Germany is interesting. It presupposes that the German people want to reunify. Certainly the older people do, but I have met some of the younger West Germans who don't favor such a move.

First, they believe bringing East Germany into the modern techno-age will be too costly. Secondly, they also believe that in the past 50 or so years two different cultures have emerged. It forces one to wonder what a 20-year-old East German has in common with someone of the same age from the West.

I'm not totally set on whether or not I feel comfortable with "one Germany," but I am sure that it should be worked out between the two Germanys. This stuff about including the U.S., France, England and Russia goes contrary to my principles of self-determination.

Have you noticed that it snows a lot, then it gets really warm and all the snow melts and then it starts all over again? Just because this is New England doesn't mean this is natural. Maybe it's that hole in the ozone layer the size of the continental U.S.? . . .Naaaaahhh.

I think it is kinda neat that Chancellor Duffey is also going to be President. Not only will he save the University about $100,000 a year in salary alone, but he might have a fondness for the Amherst campus, too.

****

There's no quote of the week because I went to an Assumption College party, and so I forgot to get one. The party was like Brittany Manor revisited. Scary, and I'm getting too old for this (expletive deleted).

Thus, 'till next week, don't forget your Vitamin C (I did).

CONTI' UED FROM PAGE 3

"I think it's going to be a record year," he said.

Skiba, who has made the Washinton trip for the past two years, said that most appointments he has attended solicited a positive reaction from the people on Capitol Hill.

"Our most important viewpoint is that we're the ones that the legislation affects. They're quite responsive. (The legislators) like to hear that the students are active politically," he said.

Although the SAFA students are all from UMass, Skiba feels that the group represents students across the nation.

"We have people from Ohio, New York, Oregon, Puerto Rico, California, and people from several different areas of Massachusetts," he said.

One of the issues that the students are pushing for is level funding for federal financial aid.

U. of El Salvador rep discusses situation

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Mirabel Rosales, the United States representative of the Office of International Relations at the University of El Salvador arrived at the University of Massachusetts Friday evening for a discussion on current events in El Salvador and the University of El Salvador in San Salvador.

A video presentation preceding her discussion addressed the frequent disappearences that occur in El Salvador.

Civilians lying dead across town streets, children's feet permanantly destroyed by army bullets, raping of women in their own homes by the militia sons recruited and returned to their families purposely mutilated: all these are everyday events that the Salvadoran people have been forced to deal with since the intense fighting began in the late 1970's, Rosales said.

The war in El Salvador is a result of the severely unbalanced economic structure in that country, she said.

"Two percent of the people own 60 percent of the land, while 65 percent of the people live in abject poverty," she said.

After 1932, there was an uprising in which many peasants were killed, Rosales said. "There was a social marginalization of the great majority of the population and the political and social manifestations of this became even greater."

She said that during the 1960's and 1970's, political power was concentrated in one political party. Then, through the late 1970's and early 1980's, the peasants were frustrated in their various attempts at holding elections and turned to violence.

"In 1979, unions, and the University in particular, became integrated, and were against the reprehensive acts of the government," Rosales said.

The University of El Salvador, sacked by militia bombings in November of 1989 needs approximately $70-80 million to return itself to normal functioning, she said.

Professors from the University of El Salvador are still carrying on classes outside of campus grounds, Rosales reported.

Recognizing that many individuals in the U.S. may view gatherings to support those being persecuted in El Salvador as "leftist," Rosales responded by saying, "It is not communist to demonstrate a commitment to humanity, it shows a humanitarian conscience."

Saturday, Feb. 24

Saturday night was certainly an O Positive night.

Playing to a packed crowd attired in acid denim, J. Crew and lots of black, O Postive surprised all with what seems an almost total departure of their past, detached and subdued, performances. This difference came to the total acceptance of the audience who quickly abandoned their seats to dance in front of the stage.

The band devoted most of their set to the new material coming out on their 12 song lp, Toy Boat, Toy Boat, Toy Boat. These new lively danceable tunes, a velvet-like combination of lead singer David Herlihy's piercing voice and layered guitar, turned the crowd into a huge sweating dancing mess.

Their more popular tunes, such as "With You" and "Not Enough," met with huge enthusiasm. But it was the band's encore that topped the night. O Positive put their special touch to The Door's "Break On Through to the Other Side" and the often covered rock classic "Tell Me Why," which sent the crowd into a frenzy.

By the end of the night, there were no more than a handful of people who weren't on their feet, and many of those people had collapsed from dancing. A small group of people, for some unknown reason, even took to quasi-slam dancing in the corner.

The only really small disappointment was the omittance of "Up, Up, Up," one of their most well known singles.

With the rockabilly tinged cover of "Tell Me Why," and the upbeat tempo of the new songs like "Imagine That," "Inner National" and "Overflow," O Positive's dark insight is amazingly transferred to one incredible performance.

Openers, the Vestrymen, who, due to technical difficulties, took the stage over an hour late, bore a strange resemblance to The Yardbirds. Putting visual appearances aside, this is another band who dislikes comparison except when it comes from their own mouths. They derive their influences from the db's and Echo and The Bunnymen. The biggest misconception this band has endured is that they sound like R.E.M.

Their performance, somewhat average and unoriginal, was a clever mixture of heightened emotional singing and fractured guitar. Yet they sounded nothing like R.E.M. Most of their set consisted of material from their soon to be released self-titled debut album.

A different Sagan heralds yet more global changes, in print

Biospheres Metamorphosis of Plant Earth
Dorion Sagan
McGraw-Hill Publishing Company

Imagine living in an underwater metropolis next to a coral reef in the Bahamas, or visiting a "galactic garden" on board a space colony orbiting above the beautiful planet Earth. These visions are not science fiction, but are in the process of becoming reality. In order to live in such inhospitable and alien environments, biospheric technology is required, technology which miniaturizes the earth's biosphere containing everything essential for life in human made bioshelters.

Dorian Sagan's new book, Biospheres Metamorphosis of Planet Earth predicts that biospheres, closed and opened ecosystems, which recycle and reorganize architectural space in a similar design to the Earth's biosphere, will be the next gigantic leap in technological and biological evolution.

Sagan is inspired by James Lovelock's Gaian Hypothesis, named after the Greek Goddess of the Earth, which theorizes that the Earth is a living organism, possibly posessing a unique intelligence and a highly developed unconsciousness far more wise than human beings since it has been developing eons longer than we have. Gaia suggests that the biosphere subtly regulates itself just as our hearts have a rhythm which beats without our conscious awareness. Sagan wonders if humans could be "the thinking cells of the biosphere," and if so, human beings would play a vitally important role in helping Gaia in her transformation to become a new species, reproducing herself by creating the technology enabling her to expand into the Milky Way. Sagan expresses, "For the first time we recognize our cosmic role as midwives aiding in the gestation, delivery, and development of a new form of life."

The Gaian hypothesis is attempting to discover a new paradigm for science, a new basis of human understanding, and as Sagan points out, the hypothesis "is not a hypothesis at all but a world view." Sagan agrees with Gwynn Dyer that Gaia could be a new religion for the next millennium. Mainstream science locked in the mechanistic world view has forgotten its mythological origins and metaphysical assumptions. Some anti-gaian scientists reject the hypothesis as being too mystical.

There is a dark shadow to this biospheric dream according to Sagan. It is a dystopian nightmare where we are entrapped in this post-modern world. There is a widening division between rich and poor and the rich will have their private biospheres where they will live in order to escape to environmental pollution. Sagan speculates that this dark vision may be a necessary ingredient in our struggle to grow into colossal new way of life.

Sagan asserts that we are living in the critical period where biospheres could turn out to be "as dangerous as a tumor and as hopeful as an embryo." Sagan suggests that since we can't study the symptoms and etiology of the planetary disease we must heal the planet through the intuitive arts. But he doesn't state whether the solutions to our problems lie with technological fixes, or through something inside ourselves. Sagan concludes our major problem is one of massive ignorance about the physiology of Gaia. He says that the ignorance is everywhere "coming from no specific corner." Now we live in a state of anarchy, a planet where "people are not in charge right now." However, the knowledge of the biosphere is subversive, it demands we give our allegiance to the Earth and all its creatures. Gaia's world view makes us into both "the collective witness and main actor in a participatory spectacle of sexual-symbiotic fascination." Gaia is a state of metamorphosis to maturity, a new regime where the idealist child retains her/his idealism as an adult.

Sagan thinks that we "must rise to biospheric standards" by going back to the ancient ways of Earth. He writes, "As a global civilization we must fall in with nature as one would fall in love." How do we fall in love? Sagan states that human beings "have become involved in the destiny of the Earth, as agents or midwives of its sexless reproduction." Though if we are the nerve cells of Gaia would it not be through our sexuality, our metaphysical attraction for each other, which gives us the ancient wisdom? Sagan's book is a joy to read for anyone interested in the future of civilization.

Splendid Me and My Girl

By SHANNON HALL and CHERYL HEWLEY
Collegian Correspondents

Me and My Girl
Fine Arts Center
Thurs, Feb. 22

If you got your tickets early, you could have brought your girl down to see Me and My Girl. The Music Theater Group, currently touring the U.S. and Canada, made a one night stop at UMass, giving the audience a splendid performance.

The tone of the comic musical is set with a glimpse of the wealthy inhabitants of Hareford Hall where we find Lady Jaquie (Rachel Kasper), her fiance Gerald (Eric Hoit), the Duchess of Dene (Karlah Hamilton), and Sir John (Allen Karpe), awaiting the arrival of William (Adam Graham), a newly discovered heir.

Though the members of the Hareford family are thoroughly convinced that William will never become a gentleman, the Duchess insists on teaching him the ways of their lifestyle. Unfortunately for William, she also insists on sending Sally, "his girl," back to Lambeth in hopes that William will take more than a casual interest in her daughter Jaguie. Despite Sally's willingness to cooperate, and the seductive, overt advances by Jaquie, William is reluctant to part with her.

After Sally tearfully sings "Once You Lose Your Heart," she realizes that she is no longer suited to the gentleman that Bill is becoming. To illustrate this point, she invites a group of gaudy misfits from Lambeth to crash an elegant dinner party at Hareford Hall. The dinner party ends with "The Lambeth Walk," a snappy, upbeat number with a Cockney flavor that only convinces William that he belongs with Sally in Lambeth.

One of many special scenes from the Tony award winning "Me and My Girl."

Yeilding to the pressure of the Duchess, Bill consents to remain in Hareford long enough to learn about his family history. At this time, Sally is able to sneak away undetected and return to Lambeth. After Bill and Sir John perform "Love Makes the World Go Round," Bill acknowledges the fact that he can't live without Sally and follows her home.

Once in Lambeth, Bill is found "Leaning on a Lampost" in case Sally happens to walk by. When he discovers that she has left Lambeth for good, Bill returns to Hareford and packs his bags intending to find her. At this point, Bill is introduced to a newly refined, and much more acceptable Sally, making for a happy ending.

"Floating By," (1987) is displayed in Sharon Harper's exhibition.

Harper portrays an artist's growth

Wheeler Gallery opens their spring semester with "Sharon Harper: Now and Then," a show which highlights the last eight years of the artist's paintings and drawings.

The display examines the human figure, a common theme in Harper's work, portrayed through a variety of mediums. It begins with paintings and drawings from 1982, when she drew straight forward figures from sight, to her current, computer drawn, abstract and imagined figures.

"I moved from working with people to working in my head," said Harper. "The people I create are now in my head. That's what the show follows."

Harper just recently began working with a computer, and many of her images are still in the beginning stages. She enjoys working with the "less direct" medium, but finds it far less personal than conventional artistic approaches.

"Computers offer the opportunity for moving and shifting, which is good, but it will never take the place of painting," she said. "Paint and canvas will never be replaced by a glass screen."

Harper received her masters in painting from UMass in 1987 and currently teaches basic drawing for non-art majors at the University, as well as teaching a course at Westfield State College.

Wheeler Gallery, located on campus in Wheeler House, is open on Mondays through Thursdays from 4 p.m. to 8 p.m., and on Sundays from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m.

The Bowery connect

By LINDA WOODS
Collegian Correspondent

the Bowery
Twister's
Thursday, Feb. 22

Often a band's raw musical talent takes a back seat to their ability to skillfuly tap into the establishment. Last year the Bowery won WHMP's annual Talent Search, proving that sometimes it's not who you know, but what you can do. Vocalist Joanne Schumacher describes the Bowery as "the kind of band a college crowd really loves."

Yet the Bowery, led by singer/guitarist Rik Les, is far from the "typical" college band. Les, the principle songwriter, has been putting his life experiences to music for over 20 years. Staying true to all his original influences, Les' music is more focused on the variety and texture of a lifetime then on what is "catchy" at the moment.

Instead, Les is something of an urban Rasputin offering the audience a journey back through time and experience. As he relates his stories, the music passes through subtle shifts and transformations, to reflect all that has influenced him musically.

Bassist Brian Dang came to the Bowery from his parent's garage in Deerfield, where he played with the Pixies. Dang says that he owes much of his singing ability to the guidance of Black Francis, the Pixies' lead singer.

All this "raw rock 'n' roll energy," as Les calls it, is smoothed out by Schumacher and Whitman on vocals and percussion; resulting in a perfectly solid block of sound.

"There is no one person controlling the talent," says vocalist Stephanie Whitman.

The use of back-up vocalists is unique to the Bowery on the local music scene. Schumacher and Whitman not only add variety and energy to the show, but they also lessen the gap between band and audience.

Whether you catch their tunes, "The Letter," or "The Other Side" on Boston's WFNX, or attend one of their upcoming gigs, the Bowery is a band to watch as they show their listeners that musical integrity is still hip.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Teamwork can pave the way to higher profits. After having your say, let others express their opinions. Innovative thinking will bring about breakthroughs on the job. Share the credit.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Give others the benefit of the doubt now and you will make exciting new business and social contacts. Help friends who ask for advice, but refuse to make your decisions for them.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Resist the temptation to brood over short-term money problems. Your tender loving care of a partner will be royally rewarded. Hang in there! An unexpected check will give you cause for celebration.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be alert to new career or romantic opportunities this week. Short business trips could prove more lucrative than long ones. Concentrate on family matters today and you will solve an important problem.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Ride with the tide of events and see what happens. Use sound judgment when dealing with someone who wants financial backing. Take stock of your resources before investing. Rely heavily on your intuition.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Actively pursue the goals you have set for yourself. Working alone is more rewarding than depending on others for help. Maintain your self-control in a sticky situation. Rely on logic.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Let go of a relationship that has outlived its usefulness. Your even disposition serves you well. An exercise program will make you feel better about yourself. Marriage plans develop smoothly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Take an open-minded approach toward other lifestyles. A hobby could produce a second income; investigate. Competition from your co-workers can be annoying; stand your ground.

SAGITTARARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Taking care of niggling little details now will pay huge dividends later. A stranger will soon play a major role in your professional or personal life. Romance is mostly happy. Be affectionate.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Taking a positive approach will help you turn a difficult situation into a productive one. Concentrate on family matters later in the day. A loved one needs more encouragement. Lend a sympathetic ear.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Seek expert advice if you cannot resolve a financial situation. Put your nervous energy to constructive use. An afternoon upset should smooth out by nightfall. A love relationship thrives.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): An age difference is not as important as you think. Research the diet that is best for you. Better still, consult your doctor! Check out a stock market tip before investing your money.

Grad student remembered at service

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The words to Tom Waits' song filtered through Memorial Hall over the muffled sobs last Friday night as colleagues, friends and family gathered at a memorial service to remember Deborah Slosberg, a 31 year-old graduate student in the Master of Fine Arts Program at the University of Massachusetts.

The crowd listened to the words of the chorus: "It's a train that took me away from here but a train can't bring me home," and grieved for Slosberg, who committed suicide two and a half weeks ago. Speakers at the memorial service spoke of Deborah's talent and vitality.

English professor Jules Chametzky said Deborah touched people in a "clear, crisp, unforgettable way." He recalled a project she did independently as a result of a novel she read about how "the other half lives." She went to New York City and compiled a chart and photos of homeless people.

"I was struck by her ability to get into those people," Chametzky said. "It was an example of her soaring and reaching out to people."

Slosberg had taught freshman writing at UMass and was a published short story writer. She came to Amherst after spending two and a half years in the Peace Corps.

Slosberg's brother Daniel said he would like her to be remembered as "an inspiration to a lot of people."

"She was bright,vibrant and really alive," Slosberg said. "She had an incredible sense of right and wrong."

"We were very close growing up," Slosberg said. "There was an internal connection where we either really liked each other or really hated each other passionately."

Slosberg said writing and reading made Deborah happy as well as her rabbit, Gabe.

"Gabe was a big, fat, white rabbit with one eye which ran loose in her apartment," Slosberg said. "She loved him."

Donald Junkins, Director of the MFA Program in English read from Deborah's course proposal.

"I like to think of art as living...To let go takes practice," Slosberg wrote. "I believe it then I share it."

Slosberg said his sister was searching for vibrancy in her life.

"The main thing she was looking for was her will to live," Slosberg said. "Her goal was to find that."

therefore jeopardizing the SATF."

"There has been a strong working relationship between the SAO and SGA up to this point, it would be wrong to put this in danger now," said Madson.

Filkins believes the attempt to place this question on the ballot is a political move based on a lack of information.

She and Karen Talbot, chair of the Budgets Committee, have proposed a revision for the SATF that Budgets Committee would remove approximately $200,000 from the monies allocated to area governments. This would be done by placing a base allocation of $5,000 semester to area governments plus a $1 per head fee per semester.

"[Commuter Area Government] presently receives $70,000 and Southwest Area Governemnt receives $50,000," said Filkins.

"The main proponents of the referendum are members of CAG and Southwest, who stand the most to lose," said Filkins. "The five other Area Governments benefit from our [Filkins' and Talbot's] proposal. It would also mean an increase of $7,000 available to the Greek Area."

still found time for a game-high 19 points. Sophomore Jim McCoy and freshman Tony Barbee (team-high eight boards) each had 17, and junior Rafer Giles threw in 10 to the cause.

Point guard Cary Herer didn't score, but did dish out 11 assists. For the senior, who is among the top 15 in the nation in that category, it was his sixth game this year of at least 11 assists.

Michael Burnett had 18 points and Kenrick Hamilton 10 for the last-place Bonnies, who were pummeled by the Minutemen for the second time this year. On Jan. 15, UMass prevailed at the Curry Hicks Cage, 82-55.

The Minutemen led by as much as 17 points in the first half before St. Bonaventure went on a mini-spurt to go into intermission down by only 13, 39-26.

That was as bright as it would get for the Bonnies, though. UMass opened the second half with a 12-3 tear that effectively cashed it in.

UMass closes the regular season Wednesday when it hosts St. Joseph's University at the Cage (7:30 p.m).

Hoop du jour: In Friday's edition, we made a list and checked it twice, as to who must beat who for UMass to finish as high as possible in the conference standings.

A quick gander at the results from the weekend shows that, indeed, the higher beings are being rather generous (we've tried to be as nice as possible this year) and everything is going according to our finely-crafted plans. So far.

As requested, George Washington lost to Temple, 84-72 (although the UMass win made that game meaningless) and Rutgers beat Rhode Island, 84-61. West Virginia has lost once (they beat Penn State yesterday, 79-71) and must still lose to Temple tomorrow for everything to mesh.

But as it looks on the surface, the possibility of a third-place finish is a bit of a stretch. UMass needs help from St. Bonaventure (they must win at Rutgers tomorrow), and considering the Bonnies haven't resembled much more than a so-so Division II team (does Tom Chapman realize he's not coaching at Gannon University anymore?), we may as well be holding our breath for a win from the Quebec Nordiques.

Stranger things have happened, though. They did beat West Virginia by 11 last weekend, and earlier in the season knocked off the Scarlet Knights, 78-74 at the Reilly Center. Ah, but we needn't harp any longer on how life doth turn into a grind on the road. This especially holds true at the RAC.

Anyway, of more local relevance . . .

With Wednesday being the last home game of the year (unless UMass gets to host the A-10 championship game), it will be the last appearance for seniors Herer, Chris Bailey, Michael Byrnes, and Sean Nelen.

Rumor has it that UMass coach John Calipari will start this foursome against St. Joe's. If he does, it would be a class move to recognize players who have stuck through four years, sometimes perpetually locked in PinerideLand, for their contributions.

around performance since a leg injury in the beginning of the season which kept him off the floor event, took third with a 51.7.

Although the regular season is coming rapidly to an end and the Minutemen are well behind last season's pace, when they finished 9-2 in the regular season and third in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championships, there are still reasons for optimism.

"We solved some problems this meet — we had a lot of team enthusiasm," Eggers said. 'Hopefully that will carry over into to practice starting tomorrow (Monday)."

"We're getting better on floor, high bar, and still rings," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "And we will get better on pommel horse, parallel bars and vaulting."

With just two meets left in the season, at Springfield College on Tuesday and at Syracuse next Saturday, it is important for the Minutemen to get high team scores in order to ensure a high ranking in the EIGL standings. Teams are ranked according to an average of their highest home meet score and their two highest away meet scores.

"[Tuesday against Springfield] will be a real good meet — we have to try to hit 265," Balocki said. "If we can hit 265, we'll be able to prove ourselves in the championship meets.

"Two-sixty-five is definitely realistic," continued Balocki. "We can pick up three points on pommel horse and the rest in other places."

Eggers is not as sanguine as Balocki about the team's chances this season.

"We're just not concerned about scores," Eggers said. "We have to hit our routines; we're not even doing that right now.

"Hopefully a meet like this will show people that more work is needed," continued Eggers.

Things may be looking up for the Minutemen, but they need to get better even more quickly to erase the frustrations of the season to date. UMass will have little time to dwell, as they travel to Springfield College to do battle with the Chiefs tomorrow at 1 p.m.

from giving her a national bid.

"I'm relieved in a sense because the season is over, but sad that Michele won't be with me next season," Newcomb said.

As for the other three UMass swimmers, Keira Cruz swam well, finishing in 50th place in the 50-yard free, and 42nd in the 100-meter free. Cruz now assumes both team leader and performance leader with the departure of Leary.

"Laurie [Schwarz], and Tracy [Young] were both off a little, but both competed well," said Newcomb.

He must be encouraged knowing that his three prize swimmers will be back next season, and barring some unforeseen event, all will return to the Easterns, a year wiser, and a year stronger.

them over the top.

"It all came down to depth," said Yarworth. "Every team here has plenty of talent, but it takes depth to win the whole thing. That's why we won."

Other strong performances were given by Evan Gwilliam, Curt Sawin, Jay Peluso and Scott Reed. Everybody got into the action to help the cause.

Four straight for men's swimming

Minutemen dominate NE championships, take nine firsts, establish six meet records

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Masachusetts men's swimming team went to the University of Rhode Island this weekend with a purpose — to come home with their fourth consecutive New England Championship.

Not only did they attain that goal, but they did it in a big way. The Minutemen cruised to the title with a 317-point victory.

UMass amassed 815 points over the three-day event, with Boston College finishing second (498 points) and URI third (402). Northeastern (383) and Southern Connecticut (335) rounded out the top five.

"We were favored going into it," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth, "but we didn't just win it. We did it with style."

Of the 20 events, the Minutemen had nine first-place finishes. Six of those victories set new records. Senior Brian McIver set two individual records in the 100-yard (44.72) and the 200-yard (1:38.53) freestyle events.

Bill Chouinard set a new record of his own in the 200-yard breaststroke with a time of 2:07.87. The other three records were set by relay teams. G.T. Ladd, Chris Barrett, Jim Gregg and McIver set the 200-yard freestyle relay mark with a time of 1:24.41.

Ladd, Barrett and McIver were joined by Jim Robertson in the 400-yard freestyle for a 3:04.19 time. Barrett and Robertson teamed with Pete Reich and Roger Kennedy to win the 800-yard freestyle relay in 6:56.46.

"I'm real happy for those guys," said Yarworth. "They've worked hard all year. I was surprised with Bill Chouinard's race. It's great to see this happen."

The Minutemen have worked hard all year for a reason. This victory gives them a fourth consecutive New England Championship, something no other team has done.

As freshmen, the senior class came in four years ago and won. They haven't lost since. In one strech, they went on a 41-meet win streak. This season the team was undefeated, and if it weren't for graduation, they would probably keep on winning.

The Minutemen basically dominated the weekend. If they didn't win the event, and there weren't many, they had several swimmers finish near the top spot to put

Women compete at Easterns

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The end of an era dawned upon University of Massachusetts swimming this weekend, when Michele Leary failed to qualify for the nationals.

Leary has been a standout for coach Bob Newcomb for the past four seasons. Her story has been well-documented; her return from a heart attack inspired us all, she holds many UMass swim records which may never be broken. Sadly, her reign is over.

Leary finished her collegiate career by placing second in the 100-yard freestyle and fourth in the 50-yard free. Leary set a personal best in the 100 free, but the time was just 10ths-of-a-second away

Men's hoop rips Bonnies, clinches bye in A-10 tourney

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team did not score 100 points Saturday night. But that's just about all the Minutemen didn't do.

The road hadn't been kind for the Minutemen this year, and usually, a trip to Olean, N.Y. (located somewhere just south of the Arctic Circle) is less than pleasant.

But maybe the Minutemen needed the trek to BonnieVille to finally purge themselves of the ailment that had been causing them to lose heartbreaking contests on the road. Whatever the case, they stormed into town and pounded St. Bonaventure University, 98-60 for their second consecutive win.

In doing so, UMass accomplished several things. The win pushes UMass to 14-12 overall, guaranteeing that it will have its first non-losing season since a 15-13 campaign in 1977-78. Now at 9-8 in the Atlantic 10 Conference, that assures UM of its first .500 finish in league play in five years.

The Minutemen also have clinched a spot among the top six teams in the conference, which means that when the Atlantic 10 tournament opens this Saturday at the Palestra in Philadelphia, UMass will not be one of the four teams slugging it out on that day. A finish in the top six brings with it a bye into Sunday's quarterfinals.

The 38-point victory margin was the biggest since it blasted Harvard by 42 (87-45) in 1976-77. UMass has never won an A-10 game by that large a differential, and hasn't won by that much on the road since a 99-58 trouncing at Iona in 1973-74. (P.S. Both of those teams went on to the NIT tourney, if that means anything. Probably not.)

Last — and as far as UMass is concerned, the least (but still pretty significant) — it was the worst loss the Bonnies (3-14 A-10, 8-18 overall) have ever suffered in front of the home folks at the Reilly Center. Previous worst humblings came at the hands of Missouri and Penn State, each by 21.

Now, how did it happen? Basically, UMass just scorched the Bonnies, hitting on 61.9 percent of their shots (39-of-63), while the hosts were clanging at 35.6 (21-of-59) percent. The Minutemen out-rebounded (43-34), out-assisted (23-6), out-gunned (four three-pointers to none) . . . out-everythinged SBU.

Oh, yeah. The depth was there, too. The Minutemen placed four players in double figures. Sophomore William Herndon, despite fouling out with several minutes to play,

Women's hoop falls to West Virginia, 85-55

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

It's been a long season for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team. Saturday afternoon in Morgantown, West Virginia it got a little longer.

The Minutewomen dropped another contest, 85-55, to West Virginia. The loss creates a 4-22 (1-15 in the Atlantic 10) record for UMass.

UMass hung close for a while, trailing 18-17 with 12 minutes remaining in the first half. But Jodie Runner (team-high 18 points) ran off three straight hoops and Rosemary Kosiorek nailed a trey to bulge the lead to 10 points. The Mountaineers would never look back.

At the half WVA was ahead 47-31, thanks in part to its 67 percent field goal shooting.

"We were playing good defense," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. "They were just knocking 'em down."

The second half was more of the same. Despite Helen Freeman's usual strong game (19 points) the Minutewomen were never able to shave the lead down to a workable margin.

"We just ran out of gas in the second half," said Hewelt.

"They were too deep for us.

"But Helen was fantastic. She had a couple of NBA type moves out there."

Another bright spot for UMass was the play of freshman Lisa Ireland. In 24 minutes she recorded six points and eight rebounds.

"I was very pleased with the way she played," said Hewelt.

"She was a terror on the boards. She's been playing well in practice, so she earned every minute she got."

Men's gymnastics team loses fight against Army

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Despite a generally positive performance, the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team was felled by Army, 263.45-260.25 on Saturday at West Point.

A poor performance on just one of six events, the pommel horse, provided more than the difference in the meet. Five out of six may be good percentage for shooting free throws in basketball or completing passes in football, but in gymnastics that kind of failure to hit on all cylinders provides the difference between the best teams and the average ones — and has a lot to do with the Minutemen are only 5-5.

UMass' inconsistency this season has provided many questions and few answers — even for the gymnasts themselves.

"Guys [on the team] are getting a little frustrated; we haven't pulled it all together," senior co-captain Bart Balocki said. "I can't put a finger on it — if I could I'd tell you."

The Minutemen began the meet strongly, scoring a 45.55 on the floor event and taking an early lead from Army. Unfortunately, the aphorism that "well begun is half done" didn't hold true yesterday, as UMass was outscored 44-39.35 on the pommel horse and had to play catch-up for the rest of the meet.

"We can't go out there and do well on floor, then go 39 on pommel horse," senior co-captain John Eggers said. "We started out with a lot of momentum, but we couldn't carry it over."

Freshman Steve Christensen was UMass' top individual performer in all-around competition, scoring a 52.65. He was topped only by Army's Pat Domingue, who scored a 53.0. Balocki, in his first all-

Board of Regents choose interim chancellor

Bromery promises to get people "looking up," through new position

Randolph W. Bromery, new interim chancellor of higher education in Massachusetts.

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff
and the Associated Press

Randolph W. Bromery, former chancellor of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and former acting president of Westfield State College will serve as interim chancellor of higher education beginning April 1, the Board of Regents of Higher Education announced Sunday.

Bromery, 64, will replace Chancellor Franklyn G. Jenifer, who is leaving to serve as president of Howard University in Washington, D.C. He was chosen over Daniel Asquino, president of Mt. Wachusett Community College, in an 8-1 vote.

As chancellor, Bromery will govern 29 colleges and universities across the state, which involves 180,000 students, 24,000 employees, and a budget of $1 billion.

At a Statehouse news conference yesterday, Bromery said he will use his experience in education and budget crises to lead public higher education through its fiscal troubles.

"My first priority is I guess to get people looking up rather than looking down," he said.

Bromery served as chancellor of the University from 1972 through 1979 and took over the presidency at Westfield State after its president resigned in 1986.

Former U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas, chairman of the board of regents and head of the search committee to select a temporary chancellor, called Bromery "a steady and experienced leader who can manage the transition from Jenifer to a permanent chancellor.

"The Regents were very impressed by both candidates and the decision was a long and difficult process," Tsongas said. "Dr. Bromery's wide experience especially in the corporate world helped tip the balance in his favor."

Bromery serves on the corporate boards of Exxon, Chemical Bank, NYNEX and John Hancock Insurance Company. He also is a trustee of John Hopkins University, Mt. Holyoke College and the American Foundation for the Blind.

Applications and nominations for the permanent chancellorship will close on March 15, according to a board of regents press statement released yesterday.

Bromery is not eligible for the position and will serve until the regents name a permanent chancellor.

Sandinistas defeated after 10 years; de Chamorro is Nicaraguan president

By DORALISA PILARTE
Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — Opposition leader Violeta Barrios de Chamorro defeated President Daniel Ortega in a stunning rebuke to 10 years of leftist Sandinista rule in this war-weary nation, election returns showed today.

Sunday's peaceful balloting — The freest elections in Nicaraguan history — was closely watched by thousand of international observers and, with more than half of the vote in, Mrs. Chamorro was winning nearly 55 percent.

Ortega, 44, stopped short of formally conceding, but said in a television appearance: "These numbers and these percentages form a tendency that cannot be ignored."

He said the precincts that had not yet reported held 50 percent of the vote, but admitted a Sandinista victory would "break mathematical rules."

"I want to tell all Nicaraguans and all the nations of the world, that the president of Nicaragua, and the government, will respect and accept the popular mandate," Ortega added.

The Sandinistas remain by far the largest single party — the United Nationalist Opposition Mrs. Chamorro heads is a fractious alliance of 14 parties ranging from far right to far left — and it was unclear how power would be transferred.

Defense Minister Humberto Ortega, the president's brother, had said that if Mrs. Chamorro won, "she would still have to deal with me," and that the army might disobey orders it considered unsound.

Whether he commands that kind of loyalty remains to be seen. UNO has said it will eliminate the draft and greatly reduce the size of the army, the largest in Central America.

Another question is how UNO, whose members' only common interest was getting rid of the Sandinistas, could form a government strong enough to stand up to the Sandinista bureaucracy.

Ortega had branded Mrs. Chamorro, the 60-year-old publisher of the opposition newspaper La Prensa, an instrument of U.S. policy and had hoped to capitalize on Nicaraguan pride at standing up to the colossus of the North.

But the voters rejected Ortega's one-party rule, which led to economic decline that the Sandinistas blamed on the U.S.-supported Contra insurgency and a U.S. trade embargo.

"The Nicaraguan people have shown that they want to live in democracy and in freedom," Mrs. Chamorro told more than 1,000 cheering supporters. If her victory is confirmed, she will take office on April 25.

In Washington, President Bush hailed the upset victory in Nicaragua as "another victory" for democracy in a remarkable year. His spokesman said a lifting of economic sanctions would be a "first consideration."

Secretary of State James A. Baker III said the international community would insist "full civil and military power be transferred to the newly elected government."

The Supreme Electoral Council said that with about 60 percent of precincts counted, Mrs. Chamorro had 459,655 votes, or 54.8 percent, to Ortega's 347,788, or 41.5 percent. Eight other parties split what little remained.

Investigators making progress in Galligan case

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Investigators in the Dec. 18 murder of Sharon Galligan are slightly encouraged by forensic evidence being processed at the state criminal laboratory in Boston, said Massachusetts State Police Lt. Edward Harrington yesterday.

Galligan, a UMass junior, was stabbed to death and left upside-down on the front seat of her car in a parking lot at the Hampshire Mall in Hadley. Her body was found nearly 21 hours later by a shopper.

Although Harrington declined to give details, he said certain information returning from the laboratory has been "a little bit encouraging."

Investigators sent clothing samples to the laboratory from Galligan's body and car. Harrington said they do not have clothing samples from any possible murder suspect.

Knives that investigators have either found or have been turned in by the public were also sent to the laboratory, Harrington said.

"We don't feel we have the murder weapon, but because we've come in possession [of the knives], we feel obligated to have them tested," he said.

Judd Carhart, the district attorney for northwestern Massachusetts in charge of the investigation, is still awaiting information from the criminal laboratory. Harrington said he could not predict when all the information would be processed.

"We're still optimistic," he said. "There's still plenty to keep us busy."

Harrington said the office has a file of more than 100 subjects who are not necessarily suspects, but who can't be eliminated from the investigation for one reason or another.

He said the office receives between 10 and 12 calls per day from the public.

"We think this [response] is because the public is aware, and they desperately want this case solved," he said.

New president causes fear

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

A Hampshire College student who was in Nicaragua in January expressed shock yesterday over Violeta Chamorro's win in Nicaragua's presidential election and fears that there may be future internal skirmishes in the military.

Justin Davies, president of the Central American Solidarity Association at Hampshire College, traveled to Nicaragua with the Delegation of the Interfaith Council of Peace based in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

"We at C.A.S.A. were shocked because the most recent polls said that the F.S.L.N. [Sandinistas] were ahead," Davies said.

"A lot more people that I talked to were for the F.S.L.N and U.N.O. [National Oppostion Union] seemed to be a chaotic coalition."

U.N.O. is a coalition of 12 parties ranging from conservative political parties to the Communist Party of Nicaragua. U.N.O. has has opposed the revolutionary Sandinistas since they came to power in 1979.

Chamorro, the U.N.O candidate for president, defeated Daniel Ortega, the president of Nicaragua.

More than 3,000 observers monitored the election for foul play, reports said yesterday.

"It would have been extremely difficult for either side to pull a fraud in this election," Davies said. "Possibly, the Nicaraguan people didn't want to show that they didn't support the F.S.L.N. in the polls and they wanted more immediate answers to their problems from U.N.O."

Davies said the economic situation in Nicaragua has become desperate because of the U.S. trade embargo. Before the revolution in 1979, the Nicaraguan economy under the Somoza regime relied heavily on the U.S. market to buy their raw goods, he said.

Davies said his delegation spoke with Captain Miguel Fonseca of the Nicaraguan army at Esteli who reportedly said the military and a large proportion of the population would not accept U.N.O's authority.

Davies said Fonseca told the delegation armed conflicts are possible if Chamorro attempts to replace army leaders who are F.S.L.N supporters with any contra army officers.

"There are very strong backers of the F.S.L.N. in the military," Davies said. "I am worried that there will be internal military fighting in Nicaragua because these people spent literally all of their lives fighting for the revolution."

Professors: U.N.O. must continue reforms

Recognizing the Sandinistas' good and stressing the need to build from that

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Two professors who have worked on social service projects in Nicaragua said yesterday that the recently elected National Opposition Union [U.N.O.] will have to maintain the social and land reforms accomplished by the Sandinistas in order to stay in power.

"Our mission is still to support progressive movements in Nicaragua," said Brian Schultz, an etymology professor at Hampshire College. "If U.N.O tries to roll back social programs and land reform, then the Sandinistas will come back to power."

Ann Ferguson, associate STEPEC professor at the University of Massachusetts, and Schultz, represented the Faculty and Staff for Peace in Central America at a meeting sponsored by the Central American Solidarity Association at the University of Massachusetts. In elections held Sunday, U.N.O. leader Violeta Chamorro defeated President Daniel Ortega, upseated after 10 years of leftist Sandinista rule.

Schultz worked from 1985 to 1987 at an agricultural college in Nicaragua to help establish a computer room in the school and to help Nicaraguans develop natural pesticides.

Ferguson worked with feminist groups in Nicaragua which held democracy education workshops and offered family planning services for Nicaraguan women.

"There was a rapid development of feminine consciousness in Nicaragua," Ferguson said. "The Sandinistas recognized that there is an incredible amount of machismo and homophobia in their society to overcome if they want to build a democracy."

Schultz said: "I think it's important to falsify the myths that will come out in the next few weeks about the conditions in Nicaragua. There were achievements that won't be forgotten — like juvenile libraries, women's centers, polio campaigns and farm co-operatives."

Cree Nation, victim of land rape

ALEXANDER NGUYEN
Collegian Staff

The American Indian Student Association kicked off American Indian Awareness Month with songs and dance last night expressing the plight of the Cree Nation at the hands of industrialization in Quebec.

The theme of Beyond the North Wind; a Hyperboreal View Of James Bay was the conflict between American Indian Nations, specifically the Cree Nation, and Hydro Quebec Utility. HQU is in the process of turning James Bay into one giant resevoir for the purpose of generating hydro-electricity.

Diom Romeo Saganash, representative from the Grand Council of the Crees, spoke on the Cree/James Bay history.

"This project has disrupted the ecosystem of the land and will potentially destroy the Cree People's livelihood," he said.

Saganash's speech was followed by the Tree Song accompanied by slides of the vast wilderness where the Cree people live. The lyrics of the song said: "And who will take refuge in my shadow...When my shadow falls no more."

A slide presentation was given on the state of the bio-ecology of James Bay. The slides showed the landscape and habitat of James Bay before and after the effects of HQU construction of dams.

Slides of the aftereffects included a four hundred mile road built through the land, 10,000 drowned Caribou, miles of power lines and vastly burnt forests.

The performances were given by The Vermont All Species Project, "a group of artists and educators dedicated to the restoration of the balance between humans and all of nature," said group member Emile Sawyer.

"What's happening to the Cree Nation is happening all over the world," said Ellen Redstone, a representative of The Vermont Group. "In order to step up progress for industrial nations, indigenous peoples are not taken into consideration but are seen as being in the way and are dealt with inhumanely."

Alise Harfield

Dream of playing hoop fulfilled

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

Sometimes dreams do come true.

University of Massachusetts senior Alise Harfield's semester — long wish was fulfilled yesterday afternoon. For a few moments anyway, she rubbed elbows with the Minutemen basketball team, shooting hoops with athletes she previously admired only from afar.

During the first 30 minutes of the Minutemen's practice, the 5-foot-3 English major dribbled across the court with a wide grin, looking eager to join the team at the Atlantic 10 playoffs this weekend in Philadelphia. Harfield participated in several offensive and defensive drills: executing layups, rebounds and even slam dunks.

"I've always daydreamed about it," she said. "When you love a team and follow it for so long, you want to be part of it."

Harfield was invited to the practice by UMass head coach John Calipari after she wrote a fantasy sports column in the Collegian, imagining she was a basketball star for the UMass "Minutepersons."

Calipari said he was pleased with Harfield's on-the-court performance.

"Alise's done a good job today," Calipari said. "I can tell she's been preparing. She's in good shape."

Throughout the drills, the coach shouted helpful hints at Harfield from the sidelines. "Dribble with that left hand!" Calipari yelled during a passing drill.

"Alise, part of practice is being screamed at!" he added.

The Curry Hicks Cage bleachers were empty, dotted with a dozen or so of Harfield's friends and curious bystanders.

Donning Minuteman forward William Herndon's jersey number 34, Harfield, in her pink Nike high-tops, got the opportunity to guard the real number 34 in a defense drill.

Herndon drove past her for a slam dunk.

"I tried to stop him, but I couldn't get back fast enough to play defense," said Harfield.

With the help of center John Tate and forward Tommy Pace, Harfield later got to taste the rim herself.

Hoisted on Tate and Pace's shoulders, Harfield took an alley-oop pass from guard Cary Herer and promptly dunked it.

"She slams a good dunk," Herer said.

Harfield said she was overwhelmed by the experience.

"I just thought I'd be out on the court for a minute. I can't believe they let me do all this," she said. "I had an awesome time.

"I was a little nervous at first. But after I sunk the first few shots, I really enjoyed it," Harfield said.

Tate said the players welcomed her visit.

"It was nice to see her enjoy herself," he said.

SAFA meets with legislators

By MIKE WESTER
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — Thirty-four University of Massachusetts at Amherst students are making their voices heard this week in the offices of U.S. legislators.

Representatives from Students Advocating for Financial Aid conducted interviews with some 50 legislators and aids yesterday in the first of a three-day lobbying effort.

SAFA representatives are scheduled to stay in Washington until Wednesday, attempting to influence legislators on the importance of financial aid. The students are also lobbying for increased funding for Pell Grants and other grant programs and the simplification of the Financial Aid Form.

Representatives from SAFA said they have received positive feedback from legislators and their aids.

Para Lichtenfelf, a legislative assistant for Rep. Barbara Kennelly, D-Conn., said to SAFA representatives: "What you're doing is great. The fact is that your coming here is helping all students whether they know it or not. Your teachers should respect you for what you are doing."

Eileen O'Brien, the chief legislative aid for Rep. Gerry Studds, D-Mass., said that Studds does not think there has been adequate funding for education in the past decade.

"Too much money is being spent on defense," she said.

Yesterday, Sen. Silvio Conte, D-Mass., addressed SAFA on President Bush's fiscal year '91 budget and the state of higher education funding.

"This is the first budget fullly prepared and submitted by President Bush. Unlike his predecessor he has shown a lot of interest in education," Conte said. "But while there are increases in the education budget, student aid is not one of the priorites."

Conte said he was concerned about funding for Pell Grants and the College Word Study Program and a $458 million reduction to the guaranteed student loan program.

"One thing that keeps student aid in the budget is the fact that people are willing to fight for it," he said. "I'm very proud of the work that SAFA does."

"They are a credit to UMass and all hardworking and dedicated students," Conte said. "They come here every year, dig into the trenches, and do significant work to help their cause."

Homophobic sign removed from outside Minuteman office

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Campus police responded Friday morning to a report that an employee of Earthfoods removed a placard from outside the Minuteman office.

Police said they received a call Friday shortly before noon that a sign was taken from a bulletin board in the Student Union.

Sarah Getoff said she removed a computer printed banner that read: "Homosexuality is Criminal."

Getoff said she was confronted by Ted Maravelias, a member of the Republican Club when he learned the placeard was removed from outside the office.

Maravelias could not be reached for comment

According to Getoff, Maravelias claimed the poster was part of his right of free speech and Getoff was infringing on his First Amendment rights by removing it.

Getoff said she found the poster offensive and felt it was infringing on the rights of others.

"It's a dangerous statement," Getoff said. "Those who fail to recognize the absurdity of the statement that homosexuality is criminal might have two different reactions.

"While one person might read it and be driven further into silence about their own sexuality, another might use it as a reaffirmation of their ignorance and hatred towards people whose sexual expressions are different from their own."

She said Maravelias became hostile when she removed the poster.

"He told me 'This isn't Russia' and he accused me of playing God and said I was going to pay for what I had done," she said.

After she removed the poster she threw it in the garbage, but the police removed it to use as evidence. She added the Republicans have not replaced the poster.

Getoff said the officer that spoke with her informed her that Maravelias would be pressing charges against her in Northampton District Court. She said she plans to countersue.

Getoff said she was impressed with the support she received for her action.

"Numerous members of the LBGA [Lesbian, Bisexual Gay Alliance] mobilized immediately and were very helpful," she said. "Everyone really came together over this, it was a powerful experience for me."

Consequences of 'just knowing'

Does anyone think? I'm led to wonder.

"Does anyone question their ideology at all?"

I am sick to the point of frenzy with people's idealism and their inability to question the morals they've had fed to them all their lives by their elders and peers.

I set aside time to sit down and question my ideology. I believe that function is the essence of truth — if it works, it's true, and if it works better, it's truer. I communicate with others to see what works for them to try to improve my ways. It seems a good way to do things.

I don't see others doing it, though.

Instead, I see people sacrificing other people's welfare for their ideals.

Not so long ago, a Catholic church in Roxbury used its local influence to stop a medical clinic from opening because it would have given people the choice to use birth control or to obtain an abortion. It had the potential to reduce the demand for abortion in the community.

The church stopped the clinic from opening anyway because the former's ideology remains unquestioning and refuses to tolerate others views.

I see people ignoring rational choices of thought and action for their unbending ideologies.

I recently read a pamphlet distributed by the Intervarsity Christian Fellowship. Inside was a cartoon in which a woman was standing in the middle of a classroom with her hand raised in question. On the blackboard were the words "DNA," "macro-evolution," and a crude sketch of an atom. The teacher, addressing her, said, "It seems we have a young lady who dares to disagree with scientific fact, clear thinking, and the vast majority of public opinion." The point is that she should ignore all that science offers if it conflicts with her devotion to her religion.

Bradley P. Heintz

What do we get when we question the static and established ideologies around us? As a close and idealistic friend once put it,"Sometimes you just know."

Stalin killed millions for his brand of Marxism, and sent dissenters to labor camps in Siberia. But it was okay because he just knew.

Adolf Hitler just knew that he would lead the Aryan race to its rightful place at the top of the world. Along the way, he killed six million Jews and more than 20 million Russians. A small price when you just know.

Lee Harvey Oswald just knew. Charles Manson just knew. Today, the Pope, apartheid conservatives and the 38th Army in China all just know.

What people seem to be unable to accept is that it is the exact same mechanism of just knowing that allowed Hitler to arrange the deaths of millions. It also allows people to serve their god or country unswervingly, no matter what their religion or politics.

I gave extreme examples above, but they merely serve as proofs of what can happen.

If you consciously and constantly change your ideology for the better, anything can be overcome.

If you will not or cannot question your ideology, then you are participating in the act of just knowing, and that is the most dangerous thing there is.

History shows it.

May your life be long and happy, and always full of doubt.

Bradley P. Heintz is a UMass student

The caterpillar cartel

Charlie stiffened his nimble body in the presence of his commander. His beady little eyes followed the commander's every move, captivated by the shimmery medals on his jacket.

Meredith O'Brien

"You know your mission," the commander said. "Go out there and make me proud. Make America proud! We're counting on you to rid our beautiful country of this wretched scourge."

Charlie's tiny little heart began to pound.

"Victory in this war will be ours!" the commander boomed.

The commander dismissed Charlie and his company of thousands, watching them proudly slink aboard the jet that would bring them to the war zone.

As the craft started its engines, the commander ran up to the jet and stuck his head inside, "Just remember . . .you're my little kamikazi caterpillars!!"

Charlie just shook his head and his antennae inadvertently poked the pilot in his eye.

"Hey, watch it," the pilot yelled. "You slimy scumbag."

Charlie decided to strike up a conversation with his buddy Carlos from boot camp.

"Hey Carlos, do you really think we can do it? Do you really think we can eat all of the coca plants in South America?" he asked.

"What do you think we were trained for, you stupid vermin? Why do you think they starved us?" Carlos shouted.

"So that's a 'yes'?"

"Well . . . I think we can get pretty damn close. We can probably wipe out the Colombian drug crop with just the 'pillars in this jet," Carlos said. "I heard that the next company will be deployed in two days. Those plants ain't got a chance."

"Do you think they'll use . . .pesticides??" Charlie asked, with his eyes bulging out of his pin-sized head.

"Naahh, the commander promised they wouldn't. He said the U.S. government will make sure they won't be able to get their hands on any."

The cargo area of the jet was getting hot and humid. The "soldiers" were getting restless and began to inch their way around, trying to rid their sixteen sleeping feet of the tingling sensation.

"Damn it!" the pilot screamed. "I'm sick of you guys. Just sit, er, stay put! I can't stand getting your slime all over me!"

"Hey Carlos," Charlie whined.

"What?!" he yelled. "I'm tired of your nagging."

"How are we supposed to know which plants we're supposed to eat? I mean, I know I like coca plants, but I'm not sure what they look like."

Carlos looked puzzled, "Let's ask the pilot."

"Hey," Carlos said crawling up the pilots arm, "How are we supposed to know what the coca plants look like?"

The pilot shook him off his arm, sending Carlos flying into the windshield. "You mean they didn't teach you what they look like in boot camp?"

Carlos, a bit shaken, shook his head "no."

The pilot paused and then said, "Aw hell, just chew everything in site."

Mysteries of late-night television

If you are fortunate enough to have access to cable television, and like me, stay awake way past your bedtime, then you've seen them.

You know them like you know your own name. You know to skip them on sight. You know the answer to this question: What do Robert Reed, Erin Gray and John Ritter have in common?

David R. Mark

Half-hour, late-night, poorly-acted, annoying-because-they're-on-every-other-station commercials.

My favorite is "Mysteries of the Unknown," a half-hour version of the popular two-minute offering:

A woman in Salt Lake City is doing her laundry when she notices she's missing a sock. Simultaneously, a man in Chattanooga is doing his laundry and finds an extra sock.

Coincidence?

And try to explain this: A man in Boston touches an iron he believes is unplugged. He suffers third-degree burns because the iron is in fact plugged in.

You can try to deny these facts, but they do occur. And now you can buy them. . .

Please.

Do I need this?

The only unknown here is how many volumes I'll have to buy from Time-Life.

The only mystery is whether I'll spend $19.95 for each book or $24.95.

Big whoop.

John Ritter introduces us to Claude Olney's "Where There's a Will, There's an A," which should no doubt be retitled, "Where There's a Sucker, There's a Buck for Claude."

We meet a college senior who says: "Until I met Dr. Olney, I was getting nothing but Ds. Now that I've taken his course, it's been nothing but straight As."

Yeah, sure, kid.

And let's not forget you haven't been to a keg party in three semesters and the hardest course on your schedule is Anthropology 100 — "Mysteries of the Unknown."

"I'm a parent, and wondered why Jimmy had such trouble in school. Now that he's taken Dr. Olney's course, my spouse and I are very proud."

What parents.

Couldn't get a clue for 15 years. Shell out $69.95 and voila, they think they're the next Dr. Spock and spouse.

Robert Reed talks about the powers of self-hypnosis, which he must have used to keep from laughing at all those stupid Brady Bunch and Love Boat scripts.

Don't get me wrong, I'm a strong believer in the powers of hypnosis. But I worry about the medium with which I'm being asked to buy these tapes.

How do I know this commercial isn't using subliminal messages. Any of you see Looker?

Finally, there's Erin Gray, who I remember as the bright, witty girlfriend on Silver Spoons. Amazing how she can become so self-centered and boring trying to sell us the creams and cosmetics of some Swedish svengali.

I'm looking at this woman Gray's speaking with and thinking, Gee, she doesn't look 71. That cream must really work wonders. Or maybe she had a facelift. Or a tuck. Or some liposuction.

Talk about "Mysteries of the Unknown."

Fallacies due to sanctions

Two-time Presidential candidate Jesse Jackson would have you believe continued sanctions against South Africa is an effective way to accelerate the abolition of apartheid.

Jackson's glaring misperception that sanctions will expedite social and economic freedom for South African Blacks is especially dangerous because it erroneously implied that if you are against sanctions, you are for apartheid.

This common fallacy, embraced by leaders under pressure to adopt a tough stand on apartheid and a naive American public, must be put to rest.

Sanctions hurt the very people we are trying to help. The burden of sanctions is carried by the unskilled workers — the Blacks.

Thousands of Blacks lose their jobs when sanctions are imposed, while Whites continue to protect their welfare through a variety of economic alternatives.

Sanctions also spurn divestment, forcing American corporations and management sympathetic to Black aspirations out of South Africa.

For Blacks, this means slower growth in wages, a reduced chance of professional advancement, and the elimination of many training, education, health and recreation programs offered by U.S. companies.

Eighty-five percent of South African Blacks are opposed to sanctions, according to a May 1989 Gallup poll. If we are truly serious about bringing down the oppressive system of apartheid, it is best to listen to those subjected to these destructive measures rather than publicity-hungry leaders simply jumping on the "sanctions bandwagon".

ARTS & LIVING

Japan through the world of film

By NICK OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

In what may be the most ambitious and diverse collection of Japanese documentary films ever assembled in America, the Five Colleges are hosting and celebrating Japan with a two week film and lecture series beginning today and running through March 15.

Professor David Desser, a scholar of Japanese cinema from the University of Illinois will deliver the opening lecture tonight at 8 p.m., in the F.P.H. Lecture Hall at Hampshire College.

Among the highlights of the festival are the works and appearances of Sumiko Haneda and Tadegoshi Himeda.

Haneda is one of the few Japanese female filmmakers and from March 8-10 she will present her films How to Care for the Senile, Akiko: Portrait of a Dancer, Ode to Mount Hayachine, which highlights the songs, dances and way of life of villagers deep in the mountains of northeastern Japan, and Cherry Tree with Gray Blossoms, inspired by a cherry tree said to be 14 centuries old.

Mr. Himeda has been called "an ethnographic filmmaker who documents aspects of Japanese culture that would otherwise be forgotten." On March 1-3 he will participate in panel discussions and show his films Iomante, The Ainu Marriage Ceremony, and We Build a House, works documenting the resourceful and respectful Ainu people of rural Northern Japan; and Okumiomote: The Yearly Life Cycle of a Mountain Village about Miomote, a village "virtually isolated from the rest of the world."

For those who revel in controversy, Noriaki Tsuchimoto's Minimata: The Victims and Their World may be of interest, especially in light of the spate of pending environmental suits against neglectful corporations in our own country. It chronicles Chisso Corporation's trial and subsequent 900 million yen compensation to victims of its chemical waste and includes interviews with the plaintiffs and scenes from Chisso's stockholders' meeting in Nov. 1970.

Shohei Imamura's Karayuki-San: The making of a Prostitute focuses on abducted Japanese women forced into sexual servitude in the brothels of the Malay Peninsula. Now aged and poor, these women divulge that their kidnappers, pimps, and brothel-keepers were actually their own countrymen, attempting to accelerate economic expansion overseas during the first decades of this century.

In what may be the most notorious film of the series, Kazuo Hara's The Emperor's Naked Army Marches On documents scandalous auto mechanic Okuzaki Kenzo's 1969 attack on Emporer Hirohito, when he fired four pachinko balls with a homemade slingshot at the sacred soverign.

Professor Abraham Ravett of Hampshire College is the Project Director for Japanese Documentary Film, which also includes, among others, Kon Ichikawa's Tolyo Olympiad, capturing the spirit of the 1964 Olympics with nearly 1000 cameras, 164 cameramen, and over 500 technicians and Masaki Kobayashi's The Tokyo Trial, about the International Military Tribuanl for the Far East, "which determined the course of postwar Japan." This compilation features footage shot and stored by the Pentagon.

Funded through a grant from the Japanese-American Friendship Commission, all events are free and open to the public. For schedule times and location, contact the Public Information Office at Hampshire College, 549-4600, ext. 682.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

Coming out with comedy

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

"Dos Lesbos" took the stage Sunday night at the Center for the Arts in Northampton. This comic account of "coming out" had its audience in stitches.

REVIEW

Lea DeLarian and Kelly Edwards are the Official National Touring company of Dos Lesbos, as well as the only characters in the play.

DeLaria, also the program's director, takes on the role of the more "masculine" partner, establishing her character early by slewing down beers and burping on command.

Physically smaller, Edwards portrays "Gracie," the more delicate partner, intimidated by society, and fearful of telling her parents, the girls at work, or virtually anyone that she is a lesbian.

These actesses seem very natural in their performance, and their actions, as well as their appearance aids in the parallel between heterosexual and homosexual relations. Common needs, and common roles express the commonality of human relationships.

Gracie expresses her desire to scream this secret to the whole world, and be done with "coming out." This is at the root of the production, as DeLaria explained, "I'm a lesbian. I'm opressed, and sometimes I just have to scream at it."

DeLaria and Edwards have been touring the play, which was written in 1978, for the last three years. DeLaria recalled, "The first time I saw [Dos Lesbos] I liked it, but thought it could have been done better."

About the message of the play DeLaria said, "I'd like it to say lesbians are people too." This it did, asside from the folly, and a little vulgarity, a naturalness came through that diminished the differences that are too often overstated.

The audience acted positively toward this message, however one woman, Susan Edelstein, felt the play went beyond the realm of lesbianism to anti-semitism. Edelstein said, "I'm offended by the way they've used the Judaism of one of the women to make jokes" adding, "I feel it's very anti-semetic."

DeLaria pointed out however that the play was written in part by a Jewish woman. She said, "When we perform for our largest Jewish audiences in New York City they scream" adding, "I think sometimes you just have to vent."

Rachel Telushkin making notice of the men present said, "I don't think men should be allowed at a lesbian performance" adding, "it's voyerism."

Shelter for homeless women opens

By LAVINIA GAMMON
Collegian Correspondent

A new homeless shelter for women, Rosemary's Place, opened in early December in Amherst.

Betsy Johnson, the president of the Amherst Friends of the Homeless, a local aid group, and one of the founders of Rosemary's Place was inspired to help the homeless after she attended a homeless workshop at the Unitarian Church.

"I wanted to reach out to the less fortunate," Johnson said.

Johnson learned that Jesssie's House, a Northampton homeless shelter, was turning 15 to 30 women away each week in the winter.

"I was concerned about the lack of beds," Johnson said.

Johnson in conjunction with members of the Unitarian Church received $25,000 in funds from local businesses, a benefit concert, and volunteer collections. These contributions allowed the shelter to open.

"We wanted to extend a helping hand to try to be individually and in a group good citizens of the community," Johnson said.

Kelley Knight, the resident director of Rosemary's Place, is a University of Massachusetts graduate.

Knight said the shelter was important because it allowed women time to recoup emotionally and financially.

"It gives them a chance to say what can I do now?"she said.

It is important to realize that anyone could need the services of Rosemary's Place Knight said.

Knight said that several of the shelters guests have been UMass students.

"The best thing to know about homelessness is the vulnerability. These shelters are not just for the stereotypical homeless we see in the movies. It could be you, or someone close to you," she said.

Rosemary's Place offers a bed for a night to any woman over seventeen needing a place to stay. The shelter does not allow children or husbands to stay with the women. Knight said that the reason that only women were allowed is because there is a great need for an all woman's shelter.

A maximum of four women can be housed at the shelter. Prospective clients are screened before they are admitted to ensure that the shelter offers adequate services for their situation. The anonymity of every woman is maintained from the moment she contacts Rosemary's Place. The location of the shelter is confidential.

Rosemary's Place is an overnight shelter, open from 7 p.m.- 7 a.m. everyday, with a maximum stay of 90 days. It does not offer a counseling or job placement program. The staff refers guests to employment and financial agencies.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Be careful not to show your whole hand in business matters. Give yourself time to evaluate the people you are dealing with. Financial worries subside when an unexpected check arrives.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Refuse to make a financial decision until you have all the facts. What other people do today will have a direct bearing on your business plans. Do not expect social events to relieve tension.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Do not be in too much of a hurry! Contracts should be negotiated with great care. Use the evening hours to patch up a disagreement with your mate. Trips are best postponed.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Go slow when it comes to travel, education and legal matters. Quiet meditation will help you sort out a difficult personal problem. Postpone any financial discussions with your mate or business partner.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Seek a peaceful solution to any differences with your loved ones. A new assertiveness prompts you to take a big career step. Overreacting could put a damper on a promising, fun relationship.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): Develop the self-discipline you need to complete important assignments. Finish your work before thinking about recreation. Those who work at home put spare time to good use. Dine with good friends.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): A small gift sends your spirits soaring. If you achieve something special today, it will be due to your efforts alone. A compromise helps you patch things up with your loved ones.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Teamwork is the key to financial success. Smooth over your differences with others to gain their cooperation. A close relationship brightens your evening. Avoid unfamiliar places and people.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): You can lay the groundwork for a special project today. An influential person will be impressed. Although romance is rewarding, do not press for a permanent commitment.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Rearrange your work schedule to deal with a personal matter. You can probably get a deadline postponed if you have a legitmate excuse. Whip an artistic project into shape. Romance is idyllic.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Curb an urge to take financial risks. You need to be more imaginative about a new job assignment. Learn a popular sport or game. Do everything possible to correct a bad habit.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): A meeting with someone influential will prove highly productive. The boss's thinking is similar to your own. Romance seems more settled. Spend a happy evening relaxing at home with close friends.

Berry canned as Patriots' coach

9-7 the next two years before having their worst record since 1981 last season, although injuries sidelined several top defensive players for the entire season.

Berry, who reportedly had great input into the offensive game plans, repeatedly was criticized for an unimaginative and predictable offense.

In the next to last game of the season, the Patriots lost to the Steelers 28-10. Rust's defense didn't allow a touchdown until 1:16 was left in the game.

"Our preparation was good," Pittsburgh linebacker Jerrol Williams said.

Rust was the Patriots' defensive coordinator from 1983 to 1987. His stay with Kansas City ended when head coach Frank Gansz and his staff were fired late in the 1988 season.

Rust's first pro job was as linebacker coach with Philadelphia in 1976 and 1977. He spent the next five seasons as Kansas City's defensive coordinator.

Rust had coached three seasons at New Mexico and four at Stanford before becoming head coach at North Texas State in 1967. In 1973, he moved to the Montreal Alouettes of the Canadian Football League for three seasons.

Berry's firing is the second major off-season change in the Patriots' hierarchy. On Dec. 18, player development director and draft boss Dick Steinberg left to become general manager of the New York Jets.

Steinberg's drafting role was taken by Joe Mendes, the Patriots' director of college scouting. Mendes has promised to stay with the team only through the NFL draft on April 22 and 23, although Sullivan said he'd like him to remain as player personnel director.

Berry had been New England's receivers coach from 1978 to 1981. When Ron Erhardt was fired as coach after a 2-14 season, to be replaced by Meyer, Berry stayed out of football from three years before returning as head coach.

Gymnastics teams journey to Springfield

Men looking for consistency in performance vs. Chiefs

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team travels to Springfield College this evening hoping to mesh all of its gears.

With two regular season meets remaining before the New England championships, the 5-5 Minutemen are still searching for the kind of consistent performance of which the talent on their roster indicates they are capable.

"I still feel optimistic about the season — we have some really talented athletes," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "We could put it all together at the EIGLs [Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League finals] and do real well.

"We want to go down and have our best performance against Springfield," continued Johnson. "Hopefully we can have a meet where everyone performs their best — we haven't had that yet this year."

With a 3-4 record, the Chiefs aren't among the top tribes in the EIGL. They've lost to Navy, Army, Kent State, and Syracuse. UMass has lost to the first three, while they face the Orangemen this Sunday.

Two years ago, UMass squeezed out a one-point victory over Springfield, coming from behind on the final event to win, 257.2-256.85. Last season, the Minutemen didn't have to hold their breath, beating the Chiefs by a score of 268-254.

Springfield is captained by a trio of seniors, Mike Furblur, Ramiro Mora, and Eduardo Ovalle, although their top all-around performer, Ricardo Portalin, is just a freshman.

UMass was helped in Saturday's loss to Army by the return of senior co-captain Bart Balocki to all-around competition after a foot injury kept him off floor.

"He [Balocki] is a big contributor for us; he's very strong on floor and vault," Johnson said.

Two other key performers for UMass, sophomore Cal Booker and senior John Eggers are banged up, although they will able to compete against Springfield. Booker strained an elbow on his pommel horse routine against Army, while Eggers sustained a strained tendon in his foot against Temple last week.

With just a three-day break between their meets against Army and Springfield, co-captain Eggers took time to reflect upon the Minutemen's season.

"Our expectations for the season were too high — we have a lot of talent, but it hasn't come together," Eggers said. "I'm very frustrated and disappointed with this season.

"In the past I've been more positive," continued Eggers, commenting on his role as a team captain. "This year, I've been more demanding and not as effective."

Why haven't the Minutemen put together the collective success that the sum of the team's parts would indicate is possible?

"It [success and motivation] happens on individual basis — people decide on their own how hard they want to work," Eggers said. "It's like the question of why some workers bust their butts and others don't.

"It's not a cut-and-dried situation where you have to put up or shut up," continued Eggers. "You just have to go out there and work with what you have [as a team]."

How well they can do that will be seen in the next few weeks, starting tonight at 7 p.m.

Freshman Steve Christensen and the Minutemen are hoping for a solid performance at Springfield tonight (7:30). The women's team visits Springfield, as well.

Minutewomen (8-2) attempt to continue recent success

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Standing lean and mean with an 8-2 record, the University of Massachusetts' women's gymnastics team will look to keep the ball rolling when they take on Division II Springfield College tonight at Springfield (7 p.m.).

Coming off its unexpected upset of Northeastern University last Wednesday, setting a new team scoring record of 182, the Minutewomen had the whole weekend to rest up for the Maroons.

Springfield, 5-5 in the ECAC, knows it is up against a much better team in UMass. Among their top gymnasts who will challenge the Minutewomen are Maurine Duffy, Tara Brady, Patti Izzi, and Marlo Yorns, a native of Ware.

Duffy, the ECAC athlete-of-the-week, scored a first place 9.7 on the uneven bars in their meet against Southern Connecticut State University. Brady earned the distinction of setting a school record on the vault of 9.25 against Bridgeport University.

"I've been thinking about this meet all weekend," UMass coach Alfie Mitchell said. "I'm hoping for a good meet."

Without counting their score from the Northeastern meet, the Minutewomen have fallen from their previous fourth spot to seventh in the Northeast rankings. UMass must remain seventh or higher in order to qualify for the regionals at Ohio State University on April 7. With five meets to go this season, the Minutewomen hope to score high to replace their lower scores this year.

"At the end of the season I'd be happy with seventh, but right now it's a little precarious," Mitchell said.

After the results of the Huskie meet, Mitchell doesn't plan to tinker with his rotation at the moment. Kristin Turmail and Tammy Marshall will lead the Minutwomen all-arounders. Still in the line-up are Lynne Morris, Lisa-Beth Cronen, and Abigail May.

In comparison to their previous meets, the rotation will run a little differently for UM tonight. Instead of two events going on at once, the Minutewomen will alternate with the Maroons on one event.

"Players who usually go fifth and sixth will now go 10th and 11th," Mitchell said. "Hopefully we can take advantage of this to attain higher scores.

"At this meet, we have to show that we're a far superior team," Mitchell said. "Our gymnasts are hungry and they're not going to be any more ready than they already are."

Men's track disappointed at New England meet

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

This past weekend is one that the University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team would just as well forget.

Going into the New England indoor track and field Championships at MIT on Saturday the Minutemen knew they had little room for error if they were to finish in the top 10.

With 10 possible UMass point-getters, the Minutemen needed at least seven to place. Instead they received three.

Only Kevin Walters, Steve Brown, and the distance medley team could manage top six finishes. UMass tied for 18th overall with Brandeis University.

Walters took fifth, while Brown and the medley team both came in sixth.

The University of Connecticut edged out Boston University by a half-point 97 1/2-97 for the overall title.

Northeastern was the only other team in the title hunt as they finished with a score of 93 1/2. Rhode Island was fourth with 55 1/2.

This weekend the Minutemen travel to Harvard University for the prestigious IC4A Championships.

UMass will need top performances from such athletes as Jerome Bledsoe in the long jump, Joe Edgerton in the shot put, and Art Smith in the 3,000 meters if they intend to offset last weekends performance.

The IC4As will mark the end of UMass' indoor season.

Berry out as Pats' coach; Rust the next in line?

By HOWARD ULMAN
AP Sports Writer

FOXBORO — Raymond Berry was fired yesterday as coach of the New England Patriots in a power struggle with General Manager Pat Sullivan. Pittsburgh defensive coordinator Rod Rust reportedly was their top candidate to succeed Berry.

The firing apparently centered on Sullivan's desire that Berry go outside the organization to name offensive and defensive coordinators, while Berry apparently wanted to fill those spots from his current staff.

"In my job as a coach, I'm hired to give these people my best judgment . . . I do things I believe in and I have a very difficult time doing things I don't believe in," said Berry, who was released one day before his 57th birthday and after 5½ seasons in which the Patriots were 48-39.

When asked if he had ever waivered on his position, Berry said, "You can't do that. You can't compromise your beliefs."

Sullivan had no comment when he left Sullivan Stadium at noon for meetings. He said he would meet with reporters today to discuss yesterday's developments.

But in a statement released by the team, Sullivan said the decision to release Berry was "the most difficult and most unpleasant of my career."

Sullivan had said improvements throughout the entire organization were needed and a postseason review was undertaken to pinpoint them.

"It was apparent to me that Raymond Berry and I have encountered deep philosophical differences as to the depth and nature of those improvements. To allow such differences to continue to exist is harmful to the organization," Sullivan said in his statement.

"I was hired to coach the team and to make coaching decisions under our agreement," said Berry, referring to his contract. "If he [Sullivan] doesn't agree with my coaching decisions he can fire me, and he's done that. It's as simple as that. He's doing his job. I'm doing mine. We both have a right to do that because this is America."

The Steelers said they had given Rust permission to talk with the Patriots.

The Patriots were 5-11 last season and missed the NFL playoffs for the third consecutive year. Berry, who had worked without offensive and defensive coordinators in 1989, was pressured by Sullivan to add those positions.

Last December, shortly after the season, Patriots owner Victor Kiam reportedly offered former San Francisco coach Bill Walsh the job of club president and the power to hire a coach or take the job himself.

When Walsh declined, Berry appeared to be on firmer ground entering the final year of his contract, which reportedly gave him control over team personnel.

But after Berry reportedly told Sullivan he planned to split the offensive coordinator's job between running back coach Bobby Grier and quarterback coach Richard Wood, Sullivan went to Kiam.

The owner gave Sullivan permission to find a new coach.

"It was time for Pat to step up to the plate and take charge," Kiam said.

If Rust, 61, is hired, it would be his first NFL head coaching job. An assistant with four pro teams the past 14 years, Rust was Berry's defensive coordinator for 3½ seasons before filling that position with Kansas City in 1988 and the Steelers in 1989.

It was a dispute over an assistant coach that got Berry the Patriots' head job in the first place. And that assistant was Rust.

Ron Meyer, then the head coach, fired Rust on Oct. 24, 1984 before informing Sullivan, who was attending league meetings in New Orleans.

"I did what I felt was within my authority," Meyer said.

Sullivan rushed home, hired Berry that night and told Meyer the next morning he was fired. Rust regained his defensive coordinator's position.

The Patriots were 5-3 at the time and ended the year at 9-7. The next season, Berry guided them to their only Super Bowl appearance in team history. They lost 46-10 to the Chicago Bears.

New England was 11-5 the next season, but only 8-7 and

GEO, Administration resume negotiations

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization and University of Massachusetts administrators went back to the negotiating table for an hour yesterday to discuss a possible process by which the GEO could be recognized as a union.

At the request of GEO leaders, the two parties have started "exploring the possibility" of applying for union recognition from the Board of Regents of Higher Education, said Gerald McCausland, GEO coordinating committee member.

However, McCausland said plans still are in action for Thursday's work stoppage to protest the University's refusal to recognize the GEO, an affiliate of the District 65/United Auto Workers.

McCausland said the administrators agreed to restart negotiations with "no conditions."

"We approached them and told them we were interested in meeting with them but under no pre-conditions," he said. "I was surprised that University came back to the table. It's quite a concession on their part to meet with us. We can only speculate why they chose to meet with us."

The restart of negotiations is a turnaround from last week when the GEO broke off talks with the administrators because of their refusal to sign a contract with the UAW.

By reentering negotiations, Provost O'Brien and Chancellor Duffey contradict statements issued last week which said there would be no negotiation sessions unless the work stoppage day is called off.

Chancellor Duffey said in a letter published last week in the Collegian: "If the GEO wishes, the administration would be pleased to resume our formal discussions. We would, of course, expect that the organization first call off the March 1 "strike.'

O'Brien yesterday called the discussion "hopeful" and said the two parties seem to be moving toward an agreement. "We had a useful meeting this morning to discuss joint concerns," he said. "We tentatively believe we have an agreement to go forward."

Neither administrator would comment on their motives for reentering discussion but said they will release a formal statement today.

McCausland said the two sides remain far from a final agreement. "If we come to an agreement [on Wednesday] we could call it off but it is unlikely," he said. "The machinery for a strike has already been put in motion."

Although there is support for the work stoppage, McCausland said it is unlikely that the GEO will vote to launch a full scale strike after Thursday. The GEO also plans to hold a membership meeting at 2 p.m. Thursday to vote on whether to continue the strike.

Jury unanimously acquits protestors

By MARC RITCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — After 7 hours of deliberation that spanned two days, the jury unanimously delivered a verdict of not guilty for four protestors involved in last spring's demonstrations against military research at the University of Massachusetts.

Jay Allain, of Florence, John Langford, of Amherst, and Jonathon Leavitt, of Amherst were acquitted of trespassing charges and Randy Viscio, a Hampshire College student, was acquitted of a disorderly conduct charge after a 6 day trial at the Northampton District Court.

The defendants expressed relief when the trial was over and were pleased with their victory. It was "an uphill challenge all the way" said Jay Allain, but "a voice inside said, 'I trust the people' and the verdict vindicated that small voice."

Randy Viscio described their acquittal as "a message that says if you want to make a stand, do it if you know in your heart it's right and follow it through to the end."

John Brigham, UMass political science professor, who testified in the trial, said the long deliberation demonstrated that the jury was clearly thinking through the issue of whether the students were contributing to the purposes of the University.

"The trial brought the jury through the issues formally that we lived through on campus," Brigham said.

Brigham believed the jury recognized the students' plight in communicating with the administration on issues of military funded research.

"People who made the decisions to arrest didn't testify at the trial [other than police officers]" noted Brigham.

In his final instructions to the jury Monday, Judge Edward Shea said citizens have the right to free speech and that political protest may have "legitimate purpose."

However, he stressed that this right of free speech does not grant the freedom to speak any place, at any time and to any group because our society is based on "order."

The jury was faced with the task of Strapped to the top of William E. Smith's 1980 powder blue Ford Fairmont, is "Paulie the Laughing Robot," a fiberglass creature with a flair for politics.

Smith, a 63-year-old retired school teacher, drives Paulie around Amherst bringing his auto-art gallery to the people. Art should be and flexible and mobile, he said.

"A statue that can't get around much doesn't mean anything," he said. "It just sits there."

While sipping an iced cranberry juice in the Hatch, Smith said he prefers that curious onlookers interpret his car-sculpture's symbolism for themselves instead of asking him for an elaborate explanation.

Smith said his art's message depends on an individual's perspective. To a student a crushed beer can may mean a leftover party remnant, but to a homeless person picking it up for a nickel, it might mean survival, he said.

"If my car doesn't speak for itself, it's a failure," Smith said.

Paulie the Laughing Robot, who wears a lime green outfit with yellow and orange stripes, is the centerpiece of Smith's work. The perimeter of the car is lined with scraps of recyclable junk: cardboard boxes, candy wrappers, bits of metal, and soft drink containers. Loosely hung around the radio antenna is a plastic six-pack ring, an item Smith says ends up choking seabirds and other wildlife.

"If everyone made their car like mine, all the trash would disappear," he said.

Attached to the hood "by the surface tension of water molecules," is a wet poster advertisement for Miller beer. Above the rear bumper is a wooden rooster and a broken

SGA gears for election

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE

Six students were recognized as candidates for the Student Government Association offices of president and student trustee by the election committee yesterday.

Alan Van Tassel, coordinator of the election committee, named Sen. Natasha Diephuis, Greek area; Sen. Ken Parker, Orchard Hill; and Sen. John Silveria, Greek area, as candidates for president.

Van Tassel said Sen. Angus McQuilken, Commuter Area Government; Bob Monaghan, president of Southwest Area Governement and Sen. Victoria Clement, Orchard Hill are the candidates for student trustee.

Van Tassel said Brian Crawford submitted papers for both positions, but is ineligible at this time because he is not a University student.

Ross Condit, governmental affairs board member, said according to Chapter 10, Article 1, Section 1 of the SGA Constitution, all candidates must be University students.

Van Tassel reported Crawford withdrawn from the University as of Dec. 22, 1989 by the office of Continuing Education, the Registrar's office, Student Affairs Office, and the Dean of Students.

The Registrar's Ofice did not list Crawford as a student.

"It is not up to us to prove that [Crawford] is a student, it is up to him to prove that he is," Van Tassel said.

Two pairs of candidates, Monaghan and Silveria, and McQuilken and Diephuis have teamed up as running mates.

Kathy Lemay, Kevin Newnan, and Carl Grygiel had planned on running for the presidency, but withdrew for personal reasons.

deciding whether the four protestors had committed crimes or were engaged in free speech.

"The conscience of America has spoken," said defendant Jonathan Leavitt. "Something must have disturbed the jury," said Leavitt, and it was either "the immorality of the union between the military and UMass, or the lack of avenues available for charge."

John Langford called the decision "important." He said their protests had been successful because of such things as the University's formation of an ad-hoc committee to study what Langford called "the increase in objectionable research."

Both the judge and the prosecutor complimented the defendants who acted as their own lawyers in the case.

brass American eagle Smith said was run over by a snowplow.

"We have to pull our country together," he said, alluding to the cracked eagle. "If a guy is following me and he doesn't see 'Wake up America!' then shame on him."

Smith said the pro-recycling theme is the robot's most obvious message, but it is not his only cause. Paulie is also concerned that American children are growing up too fast, he said.

"We're indoctrinating our youth to conform to the computer age at age nine. I want kids running around the woods and going fishing," he said. "They never have time to be kids."

"I never see kids in Amherst throwing baseball cards against a wall. What the hell do they do?" Smith said.

In addition, Paulie supports fine literature and labor unions.

Smith said Paulie's bondage on top of his car is tied in with the British novel, Gulliver's Travels by Jonathan Swift. Referring to the chapter in which Gulliver is held captive by the inch-high inhabitants of "Liliput," Smith compared the giant Gulliver to a powerful graduate student labor union at UMass.

"After Gulliver is released, he has to watch out for the little people and be careful not to step on them," he said.

"When the GEO has its strike vote, Paulie will be ready [to express his support]," Smith said.

Smith said people are not always receptive to his car. He said sometimes people refuse to sit next to him in restaurants.

"Sure, I'm trying to attract attention. I'm a teacher, that's my job," he said. "A lot of people smile and say hi, but most people won't approach me underneath the surface level."

"[My neighbors] are afraid of me because of the car," he said. "I mind my own business and keep my nose clean."

According to Smith, the local police show their appreciation for Paulie the Laughing Robot by piling him with parking tickets.

"Parking is an art that I have not mastered. I owe Amherst $35 and I can't even buy lunch," he said. "They said I parked on a sidewalk in front of Bonducci's. They're lying through their teeth."

Stansfield Turner, former head of the CIA under President Carter, speaking last night at Amherst College.

Turner: U.S. a beacon to the world

Ex-CIA director under Carter rejoices over democracy movement

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

The United States is a moral beacon to the world democracy movement, ex-CIA Director Stansfield Turner said last night at Amherst College.

Addressing about 125 people in Johnson Chapel, Turner, who was President Jimmy Carter's CIA director from 1977 to 1981, said recent political developments in Nicaragua, the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe are proof that Marxist-Leninist economies are destined to collapse.

"This is a happy time for the U.S., the world is coming our way," he said. "Our post-WWII policy of containment proved to be successful."

"Totalitarian governments inevitably find it is necessary for them to restrict the flow of information to the people. Otherwise it can't justify a one-party system," Turner said. "Armed with the facts, they find there is power in the streets and the ballot boxes."

After asking rhetorically if the "democracy" the Bulgarians want is the same thing we have in the United States, Turner said: "Of course it is. What we have is so precious."

"We need to set an example for them. We need to show them how to have both a democracy and social justice," he said.

Turner added that while U.S. domestic policy has "glaring deficiencies" in areas such as literacy, healthcare, housing and crime, the government has the resources to overcome them.

Turner urged the audience to demand their legislators address these problems. Otherwise, he said, "One day we may wake up and find out we don't deserve the mantle of leadership in the world."

About fifteen minutes into the lecture, a demonstrator carrying a sign reading, "CIA = MURDER: How Many People Have You Killed Turner?" was escorted out of the chapel by the police.

Turner retained his composure and told the demonstrator he was welcome to stay and discuss the issues as long as he did not interrupt the lecture.

The demonstrator later returned with another protestor, agreeing with the police to listen quietly.

At the end of the lecture when Turner fielded questions from the audience, the two demonstrators declined to confront him, leaving the room with no explanation.

"I'm really disappointed that you are leaving," Turner said. If you believe in democracy, you'll stay and ask a question."

Gender studies on the rise

Lesbian, bisexual, gay studies increase

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

The field of lesbian, bisexual and gay studies is growing rapidly on many college campuses, according to Michele Barale, assistant professor of English and women and gender studies at Amherst College.

Barale said she has seen a tremendous increase of interest in the field of lesbian, bisexual and gay studies over the past 10 years due mostly to studies in feminism.

"When people were studying feminism and its causes they were looking at sexuality as a reason. As an off-shoot of this an interest in studying homosexuality began," she said.

She said another reason gay, lesbian and bisexual studies have grown is that it is "safer" for students and professors to be open in an academic setting and they were demanding courses in the area.

Barale said the department of women and gender studies was instituted about five years ago at Amherst College where Barale began her dual position last year.

Barale said one of her goals for the department is to integrate lesbian literature with the 'top 40' male, gay literature that is most commonly examined in homosexual literature courses.

"We're trying to look at lesbian literature, not only feminist literature and look at gay and lesbian literature together as a comparison so the two can be compared as a common experience," Barale said.

She said there are currently six women and gender studies majors at Amherst College, but added that over 200 students are enrolled in courses offered by the department this year.

According to Barale, not only lesbian, bisexual and gay students take the courses offered by the department, but a large majority of the student population as well. She said the department is offering five courses this semester, including courses in feminist theory, gender representation and cross dressing.

Barale said there are numerous benefits to offering courses in gay, lesbian and, bisexual studies. The intellectual interests

Economics professor values teaching most

By ADAM GAMBLE
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts Economic Professor Samuel Bowles wears many hats. He is a father, a musician, a performer, a recreational athlete, and an economist. However, he said his most important role is that of teacher.

Most recently, he has been recognized for his contributions to the field of economics. A professor at UMass since 1974, Bowles has been identified as one of the most frequently cited economists in the United States. The fall 1989 Journal of Economic Perspectives ranked him the 14th most often quoted and foot-noted economist in the U.S. between 1971 and 1985. The study included all economists under the age of 65 who had not received a Nobel Prize as of 1985.

When asked how he feels about his recent honor, Bowles replied, "Well, it is flattering, but to be honest I consider it slightly ridiculous. That type of labeling is, well, incredibly overrated." He added it is "elitist."

"Most of my books were written in corroboration with others," he said, naming UMass professor Herbert Gintis as a primary corroborator.

Bowles resume attests to his work's depth as well as any scholarly ranking. He received his B.A. from Yale University in 1960 and his Ph.D. from Harvard University in 1965. There he earned the Selma Goldsmith Award for best economics seminar paper at Harvard for the year 1963-1964.

He taught at Harvard for 10 years, and in 1966, served as a development advisor to the government of Greece. He also spent two years in Northern Nigeria where he held the post of educa-

Faculty urge pest control

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

Six University of Massachusetts faculty members are scheduled to travel to the Statehouse today to discuss an ecologically sound system of pest control before the Legislature.

In a series of presentations, professors of entomology Bill Coli, Roy Van Driesche, Anne Averill, Dave Ferro, and John Edman, and professor of plant pathology Dan Cooley, will update legislators about various aspects and successes of the UMass based Integrated Pest Management program.

The program proposes a biologically-based approach to pest control. It involves the use of antagonistic insects, fungi, traps, micro-organisms, and other ecological constraints on damaging pests, and minimizes use of toxic chemical pesticides.

The goal of the presentation is to secure state funding slated to be cut from $207,000 to $0 under the 1991 budget, said Coli.

"We want to make the legislature aware that the program has benefits to the Commonwealth, and show them that the money has been well spent," said Coli, coordinator of the program.

In 1986, cranberry bogs using the the Pest Management program required 42 percent fewer applications of pesticides than non-Integrated Pest Management bogs, according to a recent report. Cranberries are a $390 million a year industry in Massachusetts.

"The cranberry story is a real success story. Many growers are adopting [Integrated Pest Management] strategies developed through the University's research," Averill said.

Other Integrated Pest Management programs implemented in the state include pest control for tree fruits, strawberries, vegetable crops, and private lawns, Coli said.

Author hosts writing workshops for women in Valley

By DIANE HICKS
Collegian Staff

Leslea Newman will begin another section of her workshop "Poems From the Heart," March 17. This program is a section of Newman's "Write From the Heart," a creative writing group for women.

Newman has published two books of poetry: "Love Me Like You Mean It" and "Just Looking for My Shoes." Her goal is to, "Bring poetry out of the realm of the elite and back where it belongs.

"Anybody can write poetry," Newman said, adding "It's not as difficult as they make us think."

Newman said her inspiration for the workshops stemmed from personal experiences. The writer gave up a teachership in creative writing at Boston University's Graduate School, "because it was very competitive and I didn't work well that way," she said.

"I wanted to set up a more nurturing environment than you find in school" she said. "I always encourage instead of discourage."

Marian E. Conant, currently enrolled in Write From the Heart, said she likes the method of reading what they have written to the others. "It's very positive," she said.

Phyllis Joyce, another member of the section now in progress said, "I have been really satisfied," adding, "I have taken two or three writing classes over the years and I never was satisfied."

Newman said her writing ability is a gift. She said, "You can't give anyone that gift, you can only teach them what you know. You can help people access the kind of material they want to write about."

Conant, a senior citizen also felt she might enroll again, adding that although most of the women are in their thirties "some of these older gals might enjoy it.

"I found out I had a lot more in me than I thought I did," Concant said.

Write From the Heart will start again the third week of April. Newman also offers "What are you eating? What's eating you," a workshop for women with eating disorders.

The writer maintains that the 10 week program is not a cure, but "one part of the process" adding "a lot of the women that come to my group have changed their destructive behavior into more nourishing actions."

Hoping to reach more women, Newman has written a workbook also titled "What are you eating?/What's eating you?". She said, "It's something a woman could use by herself."

In addition to the workbook, Newman has nearly finished a novel entitled, "Gods Waiting Room" and will have a book of short stories, called "Secrets" coming out this spring.

SUPPORT GEO

Graduate employees are vital to the academic and research missions of the university. GEO/District 65/UAW has collected signed authorization cards from a majority of graduate employees.

At this time three key issues divide GEO/District 65/UAW and the administration. As faculty, we support GEO/District 65/UAW's three key demands:

1. The university agree to an election where graduate employees can democratically elect their representatives, whether GEO/District 65/UAW, another union, or no union at all.
2. The university agree to enter into enforceable agreements with the winner of such an election.
3. Research Assistants be granted curruculum fee waivers on the same terms as Teaching Assistants and Interns.

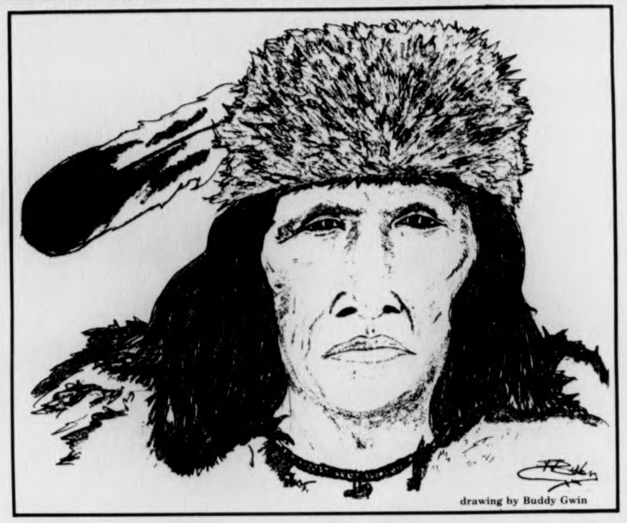
March is American Indian Awareness Month

Cultural events scheduled to heighten consciousness



drawing by Buddy Gwin

KEVIN MORRISSEY
Collegian Correspondent

March is American Indian Awareness Month.

For the occasion, the American Indian Students' Association at the University of Massachusetts has organized a series of events which will consist of lectures by American Indian activists, educators from the U.S. and Canada, and will culminate with a Pow Wow.

Forty American Indian Nations will be represented at the Pow Wow, a social gathering where people get together to meet and see friends, making it one of the larger events the UMass campus has seen in a while.

The purpose of American Indian Awareness month "is to make people aware of American Indian Nations and to foster cultural sensitivity," according to Buddy Gwin, coordinator of the Awareness Month.

Students organize for awareness

The awareness month and the Pow Wow are not new to the University or the Pioneer Valley. However, in past years the Pow Wow was held in the fall, and AISA participated in other groups' events due to lack of funds.

Last year, AISA brainstormed ways in which they could bring awareness of issues that concerned the Indian-American constituency on campus to the the larger community. Students decided to delay the Pow Wow.

Instead, they held a more private, dignified, and less commercial social to honor the late Dr. Josephine WhiteEagle, a professor in the School of Education. Dr. WhiteEagle's death left a void in the leadership of the American Indian community at UMass.

> "American Indians remain, probably the least understood and most misunderstood Americans of us all."
> –John F. Kennedy

However, sparked by the social as well as the opening of the American Indian Cultural Center on campus, since renamed after Dr. WhiteEagle, students took their own initiative and began planning for American Indian Awareness Month. In the past, the American Indian community on campus did not have the funds or support to dictate who would come to UMass and who would represent American Indian Nations.

This year AISA members have raised the funds and support themselves. They now have the ability to decide who will speak and what type of functions will be held. AISA has raised over 14,000 dollars from departments and student organizations in the Five College community. They are currently twenty percent away from their goal.

John F. Kennedy once said, "For a subject that has been worked and reworked in television and literature, American Indians remain, probably the least understood, and most misunderstood Americans of us all." This notion still holds true three decades later.

The general American public receives false information through the media and in history books which tell people that American Indian Nations are a thing of the past. On the contrary, American Indian communities have survived and are struggling to regain what has been taken from them, according to Gwin. Making people aware of this is one purpose of American Indian Awareness Month.

In this vein, a series of lectures by American Indian activists and educators are being held on the UMass campus. These speakers will include Winona LaDuke, an activist for American Indian, women's rights and the environment. LaDuke is the co-founder of Women of all Red Nations, co-director of the Institute for Natural Progress and a recent recipient of the Reebok Human Rights Award.

Ward Churchill, American Indian educator from the University of Colorado, also a co-founder of the Insitute for Natural Progress will be speaking on Institutional Racism in the U.S. and about his two recent books, Agents of Repression and TheCo-IntelPro Papers which deal with the FBI's sabotage of the American Indian Movement and the Black Power Movement.

Pow Wow highlight of Awareness Month

The Pow Wow will culminate the events of American Indian Awareness Month. It will be held in the Curry Hicks Cage beginning March 16 and finish March 18. One purpose of the Pow Wow is "to have people be exposed to and become aware of American Indian cultures and therefore of their own cultures in order to foster sensitivity of all cultures," said Gwin.

There will be four traditional drum groups from the four sacred directions, with the host drum group the Internationally renowned Eagle Whistle, from Mendaree North Dakota. 50 dancers will be dressed in full traditional regalia. Vendors with genuine American Indian made art, jewelry, clothing, music and food will also attend the event.

> "...to foster sensitivity of all cultures."
> –Buddy Gwin, on the purpose of a Pow Wow

There will be an inter-tribal segment of the Pow Wow in which people of all Nations are welcome to dance to traditional music. The inter-tribal dance "is a way in which people can get a feel for American Indian cultures through active participation instead of just remaining observers," said Gwin.

All students, staff, faculty, and administrators who have contributed and helped in making the Awareness Month happen will be honored with a dance during the Pow Wow on Saturday, March 17. There will also be honor songs and dances for the hosts of the Pow Wow and all those individuals who have helped bring the Awareness Month activities to UMass are asked to be there for this dance to participate.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Words perpetuate hatred

I was walking back to my room last week with a couple of friends who had walked out of a class because they were mad at their professor. In a fit of anger, one of them referred to the professor as a "homo."

This set my mind to thinking why someone would choose to insult a person in that manner. 'I've never heard someone called a "hetero" as an insult. Why "homo"?

Chris Muther

I recently attended a workshop that looked at the issue of harassment, why it occurs and how a person can deal with it.

The first thing I learned was that people use the insult "homo," "faggot" or "queer" as a way of saying a man is weak, sensitive or possesses feminine qualities.

Why is this a problem? Is it so wrong for a man to be caring and sensitive? Now if someone referred to me as a "faggot," I would probably take it as a compliment.

Likewise for women. When someone is called a "dyke" or "butch," it is because women are supposedly incapable of being strong or doing certain things that only men are able to do.

If someone had the nerve to call a black student "nigger" in the Campus Center, a riot would probably ensue. But if someone called a student wearing a pink triangle "faggot," who would stop to defend that student?

It is important to realize that harassment goes beyond the obvious, brutal defamation of race and sex. Harassment is all too present in many other forms as well, and all forms of harassment are equally painful to hear.

All of our lives we will have to deal with people that are different from us. The best way to go about living with others is to try and understand them, not fear and insult them because we don't understand why they're different from us.

Insulting or harassing someone may silence them temporarily, but it won't change them.

Do you think that, just because you call someone a "dyke," she will change her personality or sexuality? Harassing a person for their skin color, sex, sexuality, political or religious beliefs does nothing but increase intolerance and hatred.

Words are a powerful weapon. But unlike other weapons, anybody can use them. The only restrictions we have for them are those set by society. Unfortunately, society itself has become the main perpetrator of the continuation of the warped stereotypes many perceive as reality.

These stereotypes have been around for hundreds of years and will continue to thrive until people begin to open their minds. The world is made up of a variety of different people. Not everybody is a white, straight, middle-upper class college student. If you don't believe me, go to the Malcolm X Center, stop by Hillel or go the LBGA office.

Not until people begin to think before they open their mouths will these painful slurs go away. The next time you call something "queer" or call someone a "dumb bitch," think of the people you are offending and the intolerance you are spreading.

Leader fosters awareness

Cesar Chavez, president of the United Farm Workers Union, AFL-CIO, is considered by many to be one of the greatest leaders of our time.

As a labor leader, Chavez's efforts resulted in the first successful farm workers' union in U.S. history. Through the UFW, tens of thousands of farm workers have won tremendous gains in upgrading working conditions and reforming the agricultural system.

UFW has also been working for pesticide-free food, which has resulted in greater awareness among all consumers and a stronger movement toward real changes in agricultural methods.

Chavez remains entirely devoted to reducing the tragically high cancer rates among farm workers and their children in California today, as well as promoting increased environmental awareness and action.

His visit to UMass this Friday, March 2, (Student Union Ballroom, at noon), will focus on bringing students the message of his fight against unjust labor practices and carcinogenic food. He will also celebrate cultural diversity on campus and in the community, as well as Earth Day and increased solidarity among students, workers and environmentalists.

Come and show your support for one of the greatest leaders of our time.

Educational bias realized; history is reviewed

A principal aim of Black History Month is to promote awareness of the contributions African-Americans have made to this country's history.

Well, it seems that New York State has taken a very positive step in this direction.

Last week, the state's Board of Regents voted unanimously to overhaul their schools' American history curriculum so that it includes more contributions of non-Whites.

According to a story in last Saturday's New York Times, a Board of Regents task force issued a report that "often used harsh language in concluding that many courses in New York State minimize the contributions of minorities and ignore the wrongs committed by Whites against non-Whites."

The Regents cited several examples of omitted material, including the fact that many of George Washington's troops were African-American, and that Chinese immigrants were subjected to slave labor conditions when they worked on the railroads in the 19th century.

Bias in the education system is not exactly a news flash to many people, yet this action deserves mention. Assuming they follow through on this, the New York education leaders could provide the impetus for what I feel is the most positive change in this country's racial situation in a long time.

Bill Rosenblatt

They are finally acting on what exponents against racism have been trying to tell us for some time: that minority students are being taught to recognize themselves as inferior.

The removal of bias in education could actually result in a generation of people who take racial equality as a given, not as something that needs to be imposed on them by external forces.

Optimistic?

Maybe, but I think that education is the most powerful means of eliminating prejudice and other manifestations of ignorance.

Emphasizing the contributions of non-Whites will lead to pride and self-respect among non-Whites, while Whites will learn to respect and appreciate others.

Exposing acts of White oppression should also cause Whites to reexamine their attitudes towards people of other races.

We should applaud the New York State Board of Regents for their action — better late than never. It is especially fitting that this happened during Black History Month.

We should also encourage the appropriate people in this state and across the country to follow suit. Are you listening, Paul Tsongas and Lauro Cavazos?

Politicians should look beyond the fact that this is not the kind of short-term, stopgap measure that looks good in a reelection campaign; the potential benefits far outweigh such considerations.

The national news media could have helped by reporting this story outside of New York, but, unfortunately, they didn't find it "interesting" enough.

It is clear that racial issues only get major coverage if there is a lurid incident attached to them, as was the case in the Charles Stuart and Tawana Brawley stories, the Howard Beach incident, and countless others.

Do we really need murders or rapes to sensitize us to racial concerns?

No.

What we need is education.

Knee-high in the hoopla

Jan. 27, 1990

TIM ASHWELL (bustling about the press room, now finding Coach Calipari): Coach, I think you should find a place in your line-up for that kid from Framingham.

COACH: I don't know, she could have been a fluke. It was West Virginia. . .I'll tell you what. We'll see if she's any good in practice. Talk to me then.

Feb. 26, 1990
Curry Hicks Cage. Live.

There it was, my golden opportunity in the form of a practice shirt (reversible, mesh, and most importantly number 34), to practice with my favorite team of all, our beloved Minutemen. . . and to see if I could play as well in real life as I do in my private daydreams.

Alas, reality is often different from dreamworld.

The first noticeable change came when I got to use a real practice ball — leather and fairly new. In my head I somehow always got stuck with a bald, outdoor rubber Spalding.

(Fortunately, the change in texture seemed to improve my shot.)

After a few sprints up and down the gigantic court — which always appeared smaller in my head, probably because of the longer legged folks like Rafer Giles and Sean Nelen who need only five seconds to run the length of it — we were ready for shooting and passing drills.

Here was my chance to discover if those illusory moments in my active imagination would show their stuff on the home court. If so, then maybe, just maybe, I would be considered for the first female walk-on point guard in Minuteman history.

Alise Harfield

Lo and behold, with a little luck from the basketball fairy who surely helped my lay-up with an outstretched wing, I had done it. I had hit the first one, perhaps demonstrating that I was not JUST a dreamer — that although my imagination may run away from me sometimes while listening to WHMP radio, I could when given the chance, sink a jumper or two.

Now that that was cleared up, I relaxed and had one of the most memorable days of my life with the players and Coach Calipari. Once I got yelled at for a weak pass I felt like one of the guys.

For this senior, leading a 3-on-2 fast break with my favorites John Tate and Tommy Pace dimmed even the prospect of graduation!

In fact, my sight was nearly dimmed while going for the same rebound as Tate. (Needless to say, he got it.)

Okay, so rebounding was not my forte.

Foul shots? According to the very small group of fans that accumulated on the sidelines, I shot a hair above fifty percent from the line. Considering certain players had to sprint up and down half-court if I made the shot, one might admit to a game-like atmosphere in the air.

(Hint: I would be glad to sub in for foul shots if ever needed. I'd even sport the number 34 practice jersey if Will didn't care.)

The true thrills came while witnessing dunks by John Tate, Will Herndon (what finesse!), Tony Barbee, Harper Williams and Michael Byrnes. Then it was my turn.

With a boost from Tate and Pace that made any dream of slamming by myself plain monotonous, the dunk I'd fantasized about came to life.

It was so great to be at the rim, my head almost engulfed in the white square of the backboard, that I forgot the recurring part of my dream where I jump my height to make the dunk solo.

I guess the real thing can be even better than dreams sometimes.

Thanks, guys.

Bush receives low marks

By LINDSAY HOADLEY
Collegian Correspondent

President Bush is "frightening as a policy-maker," said Peter Kornbluh, senior analyst with the National Security Archive in Washington, who presented "One-Year Report Card on President Bush: Central America and Southern Africa," Thursday night at the University of Massachusetts.

Grading Bush's first-year Central American policy, Kornbluh gave Bush two grades for a class he titled, "The politics of intervention," an A for effort and an F for intervention.

For his course on the art of handling congress, Mr. Bush gets an A. For his ablity to recognize regional economic and social development in Central America, Mr. Bush gets a D, he said.

Kornbluh focused his lecture on the current U.S. invasion on Panama to illustrate Bush's philosophy on foreign policy. The invasion was a premature decision which sacrificed American lives, Kornbluh said.

"As if to call attention to the righteousness of the Panama invasion, the Pentagon named it 'Operation Just Cause.' But how just was this cause?" Kornbluh said. "Bush said that our national security was at stake. He even pointed to General Manuel Noreiga's own declaration of war against the United States," Kornbluh said. "Essentailly, this declaration was somewhat of a chest-pumping. And Panama, like Nicaragua, poses absolutely no security threat on the United States of America."

President Bush took the U.S. military and used them as 'uniformed bounty-hunters' to take out Gen. Noriega, he said.

"President Bush's decision to invade Panama proved the incompetence of the United States." Kornbluh said. "Did anyone doubt that 27,000 U.S. paratroopers, rangers, light infantry and other personal supported by armored vehicles on the ground and helicopters in the air could smash Panama's force?

"It's like using a cannon to swat a fly. To be sure, the U.S. has proven it can be the bully on the block. But in so doing, President Bush has essentially perverted the meaning of war as we know it," Kornbluh said.

Bush's reaction to the killing of one U.S. serviceman was over-extreme, and led to the loss of more American lives, he said. "There was one U.S. serviceman who was killed by Panamanian troops, and that is touted as the incident that led Bush to dispatch U.S. marines to Panama to take out Noriega," Kornbluh said.

"But we must note that incidences like this happen around the world almost monthly, frequently U.S. soldiers are killed. Indeed, for one life, George Bush sacrificed 24 American lives during the invasion."

Kornbluh said that Bush's operations in Panama illustrate how his foreign policy politics "are a throwback to the era of gunboat diplomacy earlier in the century wherein a president simply sent the marines if they wanted to unseat a government that they deemed unsatisfactory and install somebody who was more pro-U.S."

tion officer, which "really just means teacher," he said.

Bowles has published 12 economic books and 78 scholarly journal articles and book chapters. In addition, since 1988 he has published eight non-academic works, including articles for Harpers and The Nation magazines, The Boston Globe and The New York Times.

When asked why he chose to be an economist, Bowles said, "During my two years of teaching in Nigeria, I came to the conclusion that economic concerns are tremendously important. They have always played key roles in history. People's lives can be made much better through economics, that is why I chose it. But, when I'm asked what I do, I rarely say that I am an economist."

"When I'm asked what I do," he said, "I say that I'm a teacher. When I started out, I knew I wanted to become a teacher. Later, I decided what it was I wanted to teach. Teaching is my love."

Bowles' other greatest joy is music. Bowles plays the guitar for a local band, "The Diggers." Bowles' band specializes in contemporary and acoustic folk music, and they can frequently be seen jamming at "The Iron Horse" in Northampton. His other hobbies include bicycle touring, skiing, canoeing, and white water rafting.

This semester he is teaching an undergraduate course, a graduate course, a research seminar, and a faculty seminar.

Bowles said he looks forward to the challenge of balancing his many roles. "I love what I'm doing. I usually get up long before sunrise. I'm always excited to get the day going."

of the gay, lesbian and bisexual community can be "legitamated" by study works by gay authors, he said.

She said homophobia is also reduced as a result of being more open in talking about gay life and said she has seen a difference in her classrooms alone.

"If you speak about the forbidden, it's not forbidden anymore," she said.

Barale said although many think it would be difficult to find a job with a degree in women and gender studies, their chances are just as good as anyone else with a degree in liberal arts if not better, because they have an increased understanding of the world around them.

"Women and gender studies majors have different modes of understanding which gives them capabilities not every liberal arts major has," she said.

The Oscars: what should and will win

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Staff

Despite popular belief, the Academy of Motion Pictures Arts and Sciences isn't comprised of film critics and historians, but of rich, influential directors, actors and producers.

Dan Aykroyd will pick up an Oscar, but Driving Miss Daisy and Morgan Freeman won't.

Directors nominate directors, actors nominate actors, and so forth. Most Academy members don't see all the films they're voting on and often cast their vote depending upon popular opinion (hence explaining Rainman's win last year).

But this year there seems to be a trend throughout the list of nominees. Since the Best Picture nominees were all carried on the strength of their leading performances, (except Field of Dreams) it's likely the Best Actor winner will indicate the Best Picture winner this year. Since Kevin Costner was overlooked, Field's chances are slim indeed, despite its wide appeal with critics.

Robin Williams' inspiring performance in Peter Weir's Dead Poets Society lifted spirits but failed to save the film from mediocrity. Borrowing heavily from A Seperate Peace and Goodbye, Mr. Chips, the film suffers from an identity crisis and isn't quite sure what to do with Williams' character, who comes-off more as a plot device than an inspirational leader. Its ensemble acting is adequate but it can't compete with the tenderly inscribed performances in My Left Foot.

Based upon the life of paralyzed Irish painter/writer Christy Brown, My Left Foot is a small wonder of a movie. The amazing Daniel Day-Lewis draws upon the inner-pain and frustrations of his character to generate one of the most painfully inspiring performances of recent memory. His work is unparalleled and deserves recognition. The film is finally getting the popular attention it missed during its initial release, and if it continues to draw audiences as we head into March it stands an excellent chance at winning Best Picture.

Bruce Beresford's Driving Miss Daisy will be long remembered for its eloquent performances rather than its subtle handling of a socially changing America. Right now it stands as the film to beat for Best Picture, but its success in that category depends on Morgan Freeman's winning Best Actor. My hunch is Dan Aykroyd will win Best Supporting Actor to compensate for Freeman's loss to Tom Cruise and Jessica Tandy will win Best Actress to make up for the film's defeat in the Best Picture category.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Stone's Born on the Fourth of July is riddled with holes and two-dimensional characterizations and never quite hits you with the punch Platoon delivered, but the fact is, Cruise carries the whole film by himself, and that alone is impressive. Day-Lewis deserves the Oscar but Cruise will win it.

As for Best Picture, My Left Foot is the best of the lot, and even though everyone loves Daisy, Fourth of July will win the Oscar, but more so as a gesture of admiration for Kovic than an honoring of artistic achievement.

Bim bams 'em

Bim Skala Bim
Pearl Street
Thursday, Feb. 22

Last weekend officially started on Thursday, as Bim Skala Bim played their unique ska mix for a show that impressed everyone.

Bim are a Somerville-based ska revival octet whose name is borrowed from a magical cartoon phrase a la Bugs Bunny Their sound is a garage and R and B mixed with Carribean rhythms.

Bim's highly energized show had everyone dancing. There were even instances of bodies flying through the air — a true sign of people enjoying themselves.

The use of sax and trombone to propel the ska rhythms was fresh. For those who love the sounds of Fishbone, Bim is sure to entertain. The lyrics were original, or at least those that I could hear. But rock shows are meant to be loud.

For comic relief, Bim sang "Jah Laundramat," where one can "wash all your sins away."

Bim released their first LP, Bim Skala Bim, in 1986, on their own label, Fonograff. Their songs were well-received by the alternative rock scene. Their second LP, Tuba City, was released on Celluloid records. Bim writes and arranges their music together, making it a true group effort. The band's magic comes out at their live shows. Their coolness on stage proves that ska will be around for a long time.

Opening band, the Ululators, from Martha's Vineyard, deserve a mention. Their reggae sounds had people dancing, warming up for the high energy blast that followed.

Hell With the Lid Off
MC 900 Ft. Jesus With DJ Zero
I.R.S.

"Attention world, I am MC 900 Ft. Jesus, I am the creator, the destroyer; the beginning of the end and the end of all beginnings."

No this is not Jimmy Swaggart giving a closet lecture, but a new band out of Texas. MC 900 Ft. Jesus with DJ Zero are out on Network Records through I.R.S.

When you listen to their new release called Hell With the Lid Off, you will find yourself listening to an avant-garde sound. No, this is not a typical rap band, nor is it a typical funk or hip-hop band. This is a band with a concept album which dares to explore the deepest, darkest layers of human fears and paranoia, as it explodes from the speakers with a sound that immediately swings your puppet-like body.

The vinyl slides into place, the needle scratches the first notes, and a warm woman's voice greets you as a slightly sad organ plays in the background. She sings the words of the eternal human myth, "dreaming of a greater God."

Song two jumps out at you as the fast funky rhythm shatters the previous mood. The singing is very much in the Frank Zappa style. "The Real Black Angel" speaks to you in an exasperated whisper very much like "The Central Scrutinizer" from Zappa's Joe's Garage.

The third song, "Truth is Out of Style," just kicks butt. The beat is fast, with tons of rhythm. 900 Ft. Jesus sings in a voice so sarcastic it could be punk.

"On my way to work one day/and I spot a rocket ship/some aliens abducted me/took me on a trip/to a previous existence on another astro plane/I met a real nice lady named Shirley McClaine./Truth is not an obstacle for someone such as me./She said, for you see we all create our own reality./And if a problem does arise/the best thing you can say is don't worry!!/Be happy!/ And have a nice day."

The last two songs on side one, "UFOs Are Real," and "Shut Up" are a little less complicated musically than the rest. On the whole, they are the two weakest songs on the album. But the words are a different story, as each tells a story that many people may not want to think about.

Side two begins with bongos, scratching and Brazilian and African rhythms everywhere. There are so many things going on at the same time — a Latin beat, chanting, jazzy horns. "I'm Going Straight to Heaven," "Space Man," and "Talking to the Spirits" are destined to be classics, as they successfully criss-cross over into their very own category.

Somewhere behind MC 900 Ft. Jesus is the perfect attention getting idea. This is an album that combines intelligent lyrics, humor, a little rock, a little jazz, and a lot of pure upbeat rhythm. A word of caution though, it will make you an addict. It might even get you to listen to Zappa.

The Museum of Fine Arts in Boston is currently showing Monet in the '90s: The Series Paintings, an international exhibition of works by the noted impressionist painter Claude Monet.

The exhibit focuses on Monet's works in the 1890s, including his famous works of poplars, grainstacks, Rouen cathedral, the bridge over waterlillies at Giverny and other works such as the cliffs in Varengeville and Mount Kolsaas in Norway.

The exhibit is guest curated by Paul H. Tucker, Associate Professor of Art at UMass/Boston. According to Tucker, the paintings were assembled from homes and private collections from all over the world "through a long and arduous research process which lasted for nearly four years."

Tucker believes that the longevity of this process resulted in a "sense of completeness," which is a strong point of the exhibit.

Honore David, art historian at UMass/Amherst, adds that the idea of the '90s paintings is an interesting one, because it has been 100 years since the series has been displayed.

"Most artists will paint something and sell it and it will be put in homes or displayed in a museum somewhere — what's so exciting about this exhibit is that the paintings are all brought together again for the first time, probably, since Monet hung it together when he painted it," David said. "By going to this exhibit, you can see those things next to each other that you'll never see together again, and that's exciting.

"The paintings deal, as a series, in sort of deeper meaning, because they're cyclical," she continued. "The idea of painting different changes through time is fascinating. The impressionists were very interested in the quality of light and what happened when it moved. I think that we see a scientific interest here in moving light and shadow, actually moving it for your eye, not only on the canvas, but as you move from one paining to another. It really gives you a feeling of moving through time."

According to David, the Series Paintings began when Monet was 50, and reflect more timeless, universal ideas.

"During the time of the Series Paintings, Monet had lost his wife and he was living in the countryside with his children," she said. "He was retired and interested in the deeper meaning of life. Seeing these paintings together is so spectacular because it's like capturing and viewing these 10 years of an artist's life."

The exhibit will run at the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, through April 29, 1990.

Asian-Americans hold conference

Alexander Nguyen
Collegian Staff

The East Coast Asian Student Union, the coordinating body of Asian American Student Associations on the East Coast, will hold it's 12th annual conference: "The 1990's Census and Beyond: a Map for Asian American Impact in the U.S." this Saturday, March 3, at Smith College.

The Conference will be co-hosted by the AASA's of Amherst, Mount Holyoke, and Smith College, and the University of Massachusetts. "We are expecting over 400 Asian students from the East coast, said UMass AASA's Marissa Melliza. Registration is still open for all those interested," she said.

The all-day conference will feature panels and workshops focusing on the 1990's Census and other issues of concern to Asian American students. Keynote speakers include Warren Furutani of the Los Angeles Board of Education and Eddie Wong, Field Director of the National Rainbow Coalition.

ECASU was founded in April 1978 in response to growing opposition of Third World students and their programs. The Organization has two Regions: Mid-Atlantic and New England, combining a total of 50 colleges and universities.

"ECASU addresses the political aspects of the Asian American experience, said Peter Dao of Amherst College AASA. The Conference will hopefully encourage Five College area Asian students to realize the importance of participation in political life as well as social and cultural," he said.

Nancy Tewksbury of Brown University AASA said, "The Conference will stress the importance for people to be political, it leads to later community service."

ECASU students work on such issues as affirming the Asian American identity, promoting Asian American studies on campuses, improving Asian American college admissions, helping Asian communities on the East Coast and networking with other students of color.

"ECASU tries to represent all Asian cultures, said Steve Song Jr. of the University of Rochester AASA. The Conference continues to evolve each year," he said.

In the past ECASU Conferences have been held at Princeton, Harvard, Yale, Brown, Cornell and Columbia University and Hunter, Mount Holyoke and Smith College. ECASU has also held many College Days to provide college information to high school students in Boston and Manhattan. ECASU also publishes an annual journal, Asian American Spirit.

"The Asian American student movement has been growing a lot in the last ten years and continues to move forward," said Theo Cheng of Harvard University AASA.

Well just exactly who are ALANA people anyway?

Alexander Nguyen

ALANA is a new, progressive, umbrella term used to identify historically oppressed victims of Western racism. The name ALANA represents people of African, Latino, Asian and Native American descent.

We are the same people you have called foreigners, minorities, third world people, and people of color. Let's look at these outdated terms (though I'm sure they're still used throughout the U.S.) used with condescending insinuations.

"Foreigner"A German in Siberia is a "foreigner," a Guatemalan in Australia is a "foreigner," heck, a Texan in Manhattan is a "foreigner." Does that make them not as good as "we" are? Here a foreigner, there a foreigner, everywhere a foreigner. If you don't like foreigners, don't travel because you'll be an instant "foreigner."

"Minority"The people of my Race populate over one quarter of the planet and you call me the "minority"? Maybe if we all really did jump up and down at the same time it would knock some sense into your head!

"Third World People"This term is used with great condescension. First of all, most Black people in this country have never set foot on or seen a Third World Country! Secondly, are people of Third World Countries of a lesser intelligence? Look who's making a fortune selling you and convincing you that you're eating authentic Chinese or Indian or any of the other many foods. Besides, do you really think Chinese people sit around reading those stupid fortune cookies? "Confucius says you will become less ignorant." RIGHT.

"People Of Color"This is termed to be more polite, non-offensive, and makes people seem less ignorant when they use it. What does it mean when you categorize the human race into two segments; European descent in one and all others in the other. Could this be "White Supremacy"? From which segment do the people spend millions of dollars each year on sun tanning lotions so that they can become more colorful?

After years of coining these semantic terms we still have nothing but rhetoric. It is extremely obtuse to lump so many totally different peoples together and apply one name.

ALANA is not a new term in the evolution of labeling people. It does not carry on or accept the label of inferiority. It is a name and symbol of solidarity between the peoples who struggle in the fight against racial oppression.

Valley culture vultures hunting down foreign delights

Robin Varghese

Living in the Happy Valley, I'm amazed by the uncanny numbers of import stores and other retailers of various cultural delights from the Third World serving the exotic appetites of the liberal minded.

How easy it is to see Valley residents dawned in apparel from the Orient, the Indian subcontinent, Africa, the Carribean, and Latin America walking down the street with the ardent belief that they possess some organic tie to the culture which made their items.

Various justifications are offered. Internationalization of culture? Sorry, Madonna and McDonald's are not fair exchanges for the products of our cultures.

The most common explanation: owning a product from the Third World can only bring me closer to the people who made them. Such an attitude is only half a step away from those whose attachments to the Third World was an elephant's head on their wall above the fireplace.

Realize that our cultures, our ancient cultures, have too long suffered from Western "curiosity." Our cultures do not exist to satiate the exotic fits of culture vultures.

The issue is not ownership of cultural items but the attitude with which they are acquired. Seldom do they seem to be bought out of a sincere interest in the culture from which they originate, or even a simple ascetic appreciation of the item itself. They are rather acquired with immense pretense.

When a Tartan plaid or a Stein is bought, they are not purchased with the same attitude that items from the Third World are purchased, with the condescending belief that cultures can be reduced to mere material items.

Our cultures are not objects to be commercialized. Granted, this is a commercial culture, but the solution to the problem does not lie in commercializing the cultures of others. If a people choose to trivialize, reduce, and commercialize it's own culture, it is a profoundly sad phenomenon, but it is their right. To commercialize and trivialize the cultures of others is profoundly offensive.

If you are truly and sincerely interested in our cultures, realize that they do not stop at jewelry and clothing but continue into the realm of values and beliefs. This is the facet to be focused on.

If you are not sincerely interested in our cultures, have the decency to not simplify us into a fad. Culture vultures must realize that our cultures are not carcasses but are very much alive.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Your lively ideas will lead to home improvements or greater financial security. A talk with your mate reveals some thorny problems. Be willing to make compromises. A young person is counting on you.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Look forward to a banner day for career or business! Tell loved ones what is one your mind; they need to know. A stroke of luck helps you land new clients or assignments.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): A moneymaking scheme may have gotten off to a slow start. Do not lose faith; you are on the right track. Keep confidential information to yourself. Forget past grievances if forming a new partnership.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): A phone call or letter raises your hopes regarding a new romance. Do not allow your emotions to overrule your common sense. A close relative wants to play the role of Cupid.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Now is the time to plan for the future. You cannot afford to leave anything to chance. Correct even small errors in paperwork. A love done may be overly demanding. Take a strong stand.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): You will have your hands full dealing with a business or personal matter today. Disregard any morning upsets. Certain duties will be a delight. News from afar sparks your creativiy. Think bold!

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): A business deal goes smoothly. Avoid becoming involved in a friend's or relative's get-rich-quick schemes. A recent quarrel with a loved one can be patched up. Singles give serious though to marriage.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Get in touch with people who work behind the scenes. Their information could be vital to your success. Try to anticipate any changes higher-ups may be considering. Your imagination is a valuable asset.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Your efforts at work could bring a promotion or new monetary rewards. Put your best foot forward to win over an opponent. Your attitude plays an important role in your romantic success.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Do not neglect an important personal relationship while pursuing your career. A friend's well-intentioned advice could cost you both time and money. Avoid a showdown. Time will prove who is right.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Use the element of surprise to get what you want at work. The competition will be thrown off balance. A friend or letter will supply the answer to a perplexing puzzle. Romance blossoms.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Something astonishing takes place at work. Once you have a chance to recover, you begin to see the whole picture. An on-again, off-again relationship comes to a screeching halt. You benefit!

NCAA: Eights crazy for skiers

By RICK D'ELIA
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts ski teams traveled to Middlebury, Vt. this past weekend to compete in the NCAA Division I Eastern Championships.

It seemed like deja vu for UMass when Friday's giant slalom was cancelled because of high winds, just as the weather had postponed that race the previous weekend at Berkshire East. The giant slalom was rescheduled for Sunday.

Even though the cold winds continued on Saturday, the slalom race went off without a hitch. The field consisted of 16 NCAA Division I teams. UMass is in the National Collegiate Ski Association, but was invited to compete because of its fine performance in its division.

Mary Sinton was the Minutewomen's finest with a 26th place showing. Backing her was Marci Blacker (30th) and Marti Gilbert (36th). The three strong finishes were enough for UMass to secure eighth place. The University of Vermont won that race.

In the men's department, John Roche proved that he can ski with the big dogs without reservation as he snatched the 20th position. His help came from Chuck Holcomb (30th), Pete Sulkowitz (37th), Mike Hannigan (41st) and Josh Cohen (42nd). That consistency landed them in eighth place, while UVM, Middlebury and Williams filled the first three positions.

In Sunday's giant slalom, both UMass teams again found their niche in the eighth position. The sub-zero temperatures combined with the persistent gale winds to make conditions rather icy and unforgiving.

What's Up with HIV* Antibody Testing?

by Debra Edelman, Health Educator

What is the test? First it is important to clarify that what many people call the "AIDS test" is not a test for AIDS at all, but for the antibodies to the virus that causes AIDS, the Human Immunodeficiency virus (HIV).

Accurate testing for HIV antibodies requires two different tests, the ELISA (enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay), and either the Western Blot or the IFA (immuno fluorescent assay). When a person's blood is tested it initially is tested by the ELISA, which is a screening test. If it tests positive, the test should be repeated. If the test is still positive, the blood then undergoes the Western Blot or IFA test which are more stringent tests. Two repeatedly positive results on the ELISA test, confirmed by a positive Western Blot or IFA, confirms a "positive test result".

A "positive" test result means that the person has been exposed to the HIV and has developed antibodies. This also means that the person can transmit HIV through unprotected sexual practices where there is an exchange of bodily fluids, and/or the sharing of needles involved in IV drug use. A "negative" test result means that the person, at the time of the test, has an absence of HIV antibodies. This negative test does not mean that a person is immune to AIDS or HIV, or that he/she cannot become infected with HIV in the future.

To test or not to test? That is the question. This is a tricky question and can only be answered by a person evaluating their own past and present high risk behaviors that could have exposed them to the HIV.

You might consider testing if:

- You think you've been infected and the uncertainty is interfering with your life.
- Knowing whether your test would be positive or negative would assist you in practicing safer sex or stop sharing needles.
- Males who have had sex with more than one male since 1977.
- Women with any behavioral risk of HIV infection who are, or intend to become pregnant.
- Males whose male sexual partner has had sex with more than one male since 1977.
- If you or your sexual partner is a past or present user of intravenous drugs (including steroids).
- If you or your sexual partner is a hemophiliac (before 1986).
- People who have multiple sex partners or a history of multiple sex partners (homosexual and/or heterosexual) over the past ten years.
- People who received blood or blood products by transfusion between 1978 and mid-1985.

What are the benefits of being tested? There is currently a lot of controversy regarding this question. However, early detection of HIV infection along with early drug therapy may be effective in halting the progression of the virus and preventing people who are positive for HIV from becoming symptomatic with AIDS.

Where should someone go to be tested? If you decide to be tested, it is strongly recommended that you only be tested at an anonymous testing center that also provides both pre and post counseling. An anonymous testing center also is referred to as an Alternative Test Site (ATS) and is completely confidential. This means that your name, the fact that you received the test, and your results are never recorded where it could be detrimental to you in the future. This information never becomes part of your medical record; which is not true if you ask a private physician for a test.

For those people entering the military (including R.O.T.C.) and for international travelers to certain countries, the HIV antibody test is mandatory. In these cases, people who have cause for concern about their HIV status might consider being tested anonymously first and if their results are positive they can withdraw their application.

There are 13 ATSs in Massachusetts including one at the University Health Center. In order to schedule an appointment at any ATS call the following number: (617) 522-4090 Monday-Friday, 8 a.m.-6 p.m.. Collect calls will be accepted. For more information about the HIV antibody test, AIDS or safer sex practices please call the Health Education office at 549-2671 ext. 181.

MAKE AN INVESTMENT IN THE FUTURE.
YOURS AND THE ENVIRONMENT'S.

Most people are concerned about the environment. At GZA, we're doing something about it. As environmental specialists, we're involved in the full spectrum of government and industry projects — from wastewater disposal engineering, environmental permitting, hazardous waste investigation and management, to the geotechnical engineering, design and construction of buildings, dams, tunnels and airports.

At GZA, we have a steadfast commitment to public health and environmental integrity. In our progressive, informal atmosphere, we boast a participatory management style and over two decades of experience in all phases of environmental and geotechnical engineering.

Come share the success with a company that's helping to make the world a cleaner place to live in. Bring your talents to GZA — for the ultimate return on your educational investment.

Entry-level openings exist for BS/MS candidates with a talent for and interest in any of the following disciplines:

CIVIL/GEOTECHNICAL ENGINEERING
CHEMICAL ENGINEERING
ENVIRONMENTAL ENGINEERING CHEMISTRY BIOLOGY
ENVIRONMENTAL SCIENCES
TOXICOLOGY
INDUSTRIAL HYGIENE

Through last night's games

Temple	14-3
Penn State	12-5
Rutgers	11-6
West Virginia	11-7
Rhode Island	10-7
UMass	9-8
George Washington	6-11
St. Joseph's	5-12
Duquesne	5-12
St. Bonaventure	3-15

Last night's results:
Rutgers 79, St. Bonaventure 76 (OT)
West Virginia 55, Temple 51

Tonight:
St. Joseph's at UMass
Duquesne at Penn State
Rhode Island at George Washington

The best the Minutemen can now finish is fifth. UMass can't surpass Rutgers (11-6) after the Knights' 79-76 OT win over St. Bonaventure (was this the same team UMass bombed by 38 four nights ago?). West Virginia beat Temple, 55-51; thus, UMass can't tie the 11-7 Mountaineers, either. UMass will be seeded fifth if Rhode Island (10-7) loses at George Washington tonight, sixth if URI wins or UMass loses to St. Joe's.

Sinton was again the team leader with a 28th place finish. Following her was Jen Egan (32nd) and Gilbert (40th). The UVM women claimed another victory on Sunday.

Middlebury just nipped UVM and Dartmouth to swipe the season closer for the men. UMass relied on Holcomb (30th), Sulkowitz (34th) and Hannigan (36th) to earn their eighth place berth.

This race concluded another successful season for the UMass ski teams. Stowe, Vt. will host the NCAA Championships this weekend. However, UMass is unable to compete because of NCAA rules.

Lennice Johnson ran the 600-meter with a time of 1:29.54. Johnson ran the trials with a time of 1:26.8, her personal best. Johnson placed eighth in the triple jump with a distance of 10.93 meters.

Both Tina White (6th) and Rachel Castriotta (9th) placed for UMass. White threw the 20-pound weight for 45-2½ while Castriotta threw for 43-1. Prior to New Englands, both women shattered the school record of 41-11½ set in 1989 by Helen Balaouras.

Running the mile were Maureen Meldrim and Shana Smith. Meldrim finished 10th with 5:11.10, as Smith finished 11th with 5:12.17. Neither the 20-pound weight nor the mile held trials.

UMass finished eighth with 33 points. Placement at New Englands: Connecticut (115), Boston College (65), Providence College (64), Rhode Island (55), Northeastern (47), Boston University (39) and Springfield College (39).

Men's gymnastics slips by Springfield

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team took a 262.15-257.1 victory over Springfield College last night, raising its record to 6-5 overall (3-3 in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League).

Throughout this season, the Minutemen have had difficulty sustaining a consistent performance for an entire meet — until last night.

"We had a good overall team effort — we beat them on every event," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "I think a meet like this builds team unity."

Freshman Steve Christensen was a catalyst for the Minutemen, scoring a 53.8 in all-around competition to lead all gymnasts. Senior co-captain Bart Balocki was second overall with a 52.45.

Both scores were college highs for the two UMass standouts.

"Overall, I'm very pleased — although I did miss on my rings and pommel horse routines," Christensen said. "We acted as a team tonight — everyone was together."

"I'm pumped," Balocki said. "Steve Christensen had a great meet, I had a great meet; as a team we had a great meet.

"This makes all the work worthwhile," continued Balocki. The Minutemen will have to continue their encouraging performance to end the regular season on a winning note, as they travel to Syracuse to face the Orangemen on Saturday.

"We still have a lot things to work out — we haven't had a meet in the 260s away from home until tonight," Johnson said. "If we can get another one [score in the 260s] in Syracuse, that would be a good objective."

"It'll be a really, really tough meet [against Syracuse] — we're probably the underdogs," freshman Rob Thomas said.

The Minutemen would certainly be helped if senior co-captain John Eggers and sophomore Cal Booker can return to all-around competition. Eggers has been suffering from a lingering tendon injury suffered against Temple, while Booker has been plagued by a sore elbow suffered last Saturday against Army.

Booker competed in three events, most notably floor, where he scored a 9.45.

"I watered down my set [because of the elbow] — I was just trying to get a good score," Booker said.

Eggers, unable to compete in floor and vaulting, will return to all-around action on Saturday.

"If we can get John and Cal back in the line-up [Saturday], we can really start to crank," Christensen said.

Although the competition lying ahead will be tougher than what the Minutemen faced last night, improvement has to start somewhere.

"We needed [a win] bad," Booker said. "I think it will change everyone."

Freshman Steve Christensen and the Minutemen knocked off rival Springfield College last night in Springfield.

Minutewomen also win, with record outing

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team also won its meet at Springfield College last night, scoring a school record for points with a 184.90-170.65 win over the host Chiefs.

"This was our best meet of the year," said UMass coach Alfie Mitchell. "We really dominated."

The Minutewomen (9-2) swept the all-around event, with senior Kristin Turmail winning it with a score of 37.55. Tammy Marshall (37.45), Erin Klier (36.55), Kim Grady (36.45) and Erika Baxter (36.30) rounded out the top five all-around scores for UMass.

Editor's note: Because of deadline limitations, further details were not available at press time. A full story will be included in tomorrow's issue of the Collegian.

Track team takes eighth at NE meet

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's indoor track team set two school records and won two events at the New England Championships held at Boston University this past weekend.

"Everyone responded to the competition very well, especially the relay teams. We saw some teams fold," said assistant coach Jim Giroux. "We were tired on Sunday, yet we came together. It was exciting to score more points on Sunday than Saturday."

LeeAnn Ambrose placed first and set a new school record in the 400-meters with a time of 55.44. Ambrose smashed her own school record, set in fall 1989 (56.78).

Another first-place winner was Becky Johnson in the 1000-yard with a 2:37.31. Johnson's personal best and school record are held at 2:35.3.

"The team did a phenomenal job. They gave a very gutsy performance," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "They're looking great. I'm very proud."

The 4x800-meter relay team broke the school record with 9:16.51. Running the relay were Maureen Meldrim (2:20.6), Cathy Crocker (2:18.7), Shana Smith (2:18.9) and Becky Johnson (2:18.1). UMass placed third in New England behind Boston College (9:08.89) and Holy Cross (9:14.44).

LaFreniere said the prior record was 9:23.5, set in 1980. She said the fastest time run this season was 9:40, and she was very impressed by the run at BU.

Also placing third, the 4x400-meter relay team finished with 3:53.31, behind Northeastern University (3:51.85) and Connecticut (3:52.72). This was the fastest finish for the relay team this season. Leading off at New Englands was Julie Muccini (59.0), followed by Dana Smith (59.3), Lennice Johnson (59.0) and anchored by LeeAnn Ambrose (56.0). Ambrose's time for this run set a new personal best as well as a school record.

Men's hoop hosts St. Joe's

Minutemen prep for A-10 tourney; seniors in final home game

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Let's not write anybody off yet. But unless the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team makes it to the final game of the Atlantic 10 tournament and plays a lower-seeded team in that game, tonight's game with A-10 rival St. Josephs will be the last game that four members of the Minutemen play at the Curry Hicks Cage.

It is always sad when a senior plays his last game at the Cage. This year's seniors have reason to feel good about themselves though. They can say that they were a big part of turning the UMass basketball program around.

No matter whether they win or lose tonight, the Minutemen will have finished the regular season with a winning record for the first time since 1977-78. If UMass wins, it will be the first time ever that it has finished above .500 in the A-10.

Without Cary Herer, Chris Bailey, Michael Byrnes and Sean Nelen that reality might never have come true this season.

"We've had great senior leadership," UMass coach John Calipari said. "They've shown such a great work ethic and attitude. It's been important because of how young our team is. Any time your team is winning, you've got to have great senior leadership."

Herer has led the team on the court at the point guard slot. Herer did not see many minutes in his first three years at UMass, sitting behind the likes of Carl Smith (who holds the UMass record for assists in a season), Bailey, and Anton Brown last year. The only time you saw number 14 was during junk time.

But after a vast improvement in his game that Herer made over the summer when he played in the Maccabiah games in Israel, Calipari was impressed with the point guard from Fairfield, Conn. When Anton Brown went down with a leg injury early in the year, Herer became the starter and the results could not have been more pleasing to the Minutemen. Herer is leading the A-10 and is among the leaders in the nation in assists. He also is third in the A-10 in steals.

"Cary has just overachieved," Calipari said. "I'm proud of the fact that when he got his opportunity, he took advantage of it."

Bailey has been Herer's backup. The Springfield native has given Calipari some solid minutes when he's been called on to bring the ball up, especially lately. "He's just been a great kid," Calipari said. "He's played great the last month and a half. Every time I've put him in, he's helped us."

Byrnes, the outside bomber from Canton, has not seen much action this year, mainly because the Minutemen are very deep in the frontcourt. "He's not been playing as much as last year, but he's improved, he's really improved," Calipari said.

It is a rarity that you'll see guard Sean Nelen on the court during a UMass game. But he has been a model example to the rest of the team in practice. "He works hard every practice," Calipari said. "And it's hard for him, knowing that he's hardly ever going to play. But he still goes out there and works hard."

UMass lost to St. Joe's a couple weeks ago, which gives the Minutemen a lot of incentive for this game. "It's a pride game," Calipari said.

Intramural notices

Intramural entries for spring softball (men's, women's and co-rec), co-rec soccer and volleyball special are due Tuesday, March 13 in the Intramural Office.

Coalition supports GEO

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Although University of Massachusetts campus unions plan to join the Graduate Employee Organization in a solidarity rally today at noon, they also hope to promote their own labor demands to the University administration.

The Leadership Coalition, which will participate in the rally, has charged the administration with "a disturbing anti-labor trend on campus." The Coalition is an umbrella group composed of the GEO, Graduate Student Senate, Faculty Senate, the student trustee, the SGA president and representatives from the four unions on campus.

The organization used the example of the non-union steelworkers from Rhode Island working on the Polymer Science Center and the increased number of non-union contracts bids, as evidence of the anti-labor trend.

The stalled contract negotiations with the Massachusetts Society of Professors, University Staff Association, and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees was also cited by the Coalition as further evidence of a University bias against labor organizations.

Members of the Coalition said while they are pleased at the progress the GEO has made, they are disappointed with the administration's response to the negotiations with other campus unions.

Ferd Wulkan, an organizer with the Service Employees International Union Local 509, said the administration is "stonewalling" by refusing to meet with SEIU negotiators.

"They have made real concrete gains, more than any other union on campus still fighting for a contract," he said. "Tomorrow is not just a GEO rally but for the all the unions on campus to take their issues out to the public."

John W. Cole, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said the MSP, which has 1,100 members on the Amherst campus, has been working without a contract since last year.

He said the union has an "endless" list of complaints to discuss with the administration but its chief concerns is with the use of external vendors in place of union labor.

"The University is using non-union labor to put up the steel on the new engineering building and has begun looking at contracting out maintenance and child care," he said. "There is a whole series of movements by the administration to move labor off campus."

GEO boycotts today

Administration refuses to compromise

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization plan to trade classrooms for picket lines today as part of a one-day work stoppage to protest University administrators' refusal to recognize it as a union.

Nearly 1,400 graduate students, out of approximately 2,500, teach in some position. GEO leaders have said the union, an affilate of District 65/United Auto Workers, comprises some 1,300 graduate students.

Larry Mann, department head of mathematics and statistics, said his department will bear the brunt of the work stoppage because it includes nearly 45 teaching assistants, 15 to 20 of whom teach undergraduate courses in place of full professors.

"We will be seriously impacted by a strike," he said. "We could see students in the thousands disrupted."

According to the University news office, teaching assistants are concentrated in three main areas: introductory math, foreign languages and writing. Graduate student employees teach 13 percent of all lectures, 61 percent of lab sections and 83 percent of discussion sections.

The GEO membership is scheduled to vote today at 2 p.m. on whether to launch a full-scale strike, but GEO leaders last night indicated that they will recommend at least a 30-day moratorium on a strike vote.

The moratorium would buy time for the GEO to lobby the Board of Regents of Higher Education for the authority to hold an election whereby graduate students may choose a union to represent them, GEO leaders said.

The University administration does not have the authority to officially recognize the GEO as a union, but GEO leaders said the administration's support would increase their chances of gaining recognition.

The planned work stoppage follows more than a month of negotiations with Chancellor Duffey and Provost O'Brien in which the two parties have reached agreement on two of the three demands issued by GEO leaders in January.

The administrators agreed this month to provide financial aid waivers for graduate student employees and said they would work to insure that the number of graduate student employees does not significantly decrease.

If the board grants this petition, an election will held and any union will be allowed to vie for the right to represent graduate students, said Gerald McCausland, a GEO member who is involved with the negotiations.

Students return from D.C. lobby

By MICHAEL WESTER

WASHINGTON — To some University of Massachusetts students, activism is pausing to listen to a speaker on the Student Union steps. This is not true for the students involved in Students Advocating Financial Aid.

Thirty-four SAFA students demonstrated their idea of activism this week as they traveled to Washington DC, not just to fight for themselves, but to represent students across the country.

The group returned to Amherst last night after speaking to approximately 116 legislators during three days of intensive lobbying on Capital Hill.

With President Bush's Fiscal Year 1991 budget proposal currently being considered by the legislature, this was an ideal time for SAFA to voice its concerns. Bush's proposal would reduce financial aid for 300,000 students, according to an article in The Chronicle of Higher Education.

Mary Jo Bazarian, treasurer of SAFA, was pleased with SAFA's success. "I think we were successful in letting the legislators know we weren't going to let [cuts to student aid programs] slide by," she said. "I think they realize now that students are a lot more aware about financial aid."

Using the knowledge acquired in the months of preparation for the trip, SAFA bombarded the Capital with facts, figures, and the personal viewpoints of financial aid recipients.

Some discussion between the legislators and SAFA was centered around where the money for increased student aid would come from.

SAFA president Christine Thibodeau said: "One of the legislative aides told us that 'our first priority is the military, and education should be a family responsibility. Let's not subsidize everything in the United States.'"

"You have two types of people here," Thibodeau said. "One type who are willing to take a stand against defense spending abuses and realize that education is not getting

Administrator remembers alienation

By CHRISTIN COLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

Dierdre A. Ling, vice chancellor for University Relations and Development, yesterday said she remembered the pain and alienation of growing up as a bicultural Asian American during the 40s and 50s in America.

At the third in a series of Women's Studies Brown Bag Lunches, Ling said she experienced racial prejudice as early as nursery school.

She said at the age of four, she was subject to racist verbal harassment by her peers. As a result, Ling said she hit one of her classmates.

"I committed the first and only physically violent act in my life," she said.

Ling said she was ostracized in the sixth grade. While she was out of the room, her teacher, while praising Ling's intelligence said, "She's not even white!"

Ling was raised on Long Island in an affluent neighborhood. Her father owned and operated a successful import and retail business in New York City.

She said her family had to endure much racial intolerance.

Ling said a businessman on the same block as her father's business displayed a sign in the window reading, "Don't patronize the Jap."

There was much anti-Asian sentiment when Ling's parents were married in 1941. Her father is Chinese and her mother is American. Ling described her parents' marriage as a "brave and courageous thing."

During and after World War II in the United States, Ling said Americans associated all Asians with the Japanese.

The Lesbian and Gay Pride March Update

Organizing for the 1990 Lesbian and Gay pride March is underway with large and energetic work committees. Permits have been obtained for the May 5 march up Main Street in Northampton to the rally site at Pulaski Park.

The Program Committee is contacting speakers and entertainers for a rally that promises to be diverse and empowering. The Outreach Committee is composing a "signature ad" to be published in the Gazette shortly before the march. The text of the ad will be available soon so that anyone who wants to send a contribution and sign their name can do so.

Volunteers are needed for peacekeeping, accessibility assistance, crew work, etc. If you'd like to help, please contact us at P.O. Box 1223, Northampton MA 01061 or call 586-0622.

We believe the 1990 March will be exciting and empowering for all of us — lesbians, gay men and allies — and we welcome your support.

Supreme Court gives new search powers

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court today gave police broad new power to conduct sweeping searches after making arrests in private homes.

By a 7-2 vote, the justices said the police may use evidence seized when they arrested a Maryland man, Jerome Buie, accused of armed robbery. The ruling reinstated Buie's conviction and 35-year prison sentence.

Justice Byron R. White, writing for the court, said police may search throughout a house when they have a reasonable suspicion there is a hidden danger to the arresting officers - even if the authorities lack a search warrant and probable cause to believe there is a danger.

White said the Constitution "permits a properly limited protective sweep in conjunction with an in-home arrest when the searching officer possesses a reasonable belief based on specific and articulable facts that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene."

Prince George's County police investigating the Feb. 3, 1986, armed robbery of a restaurant obtained arrest warrants for Buie and Lloyd Allen.

A half-dozen police officers went to Buie's home in Riverdale two days after the robbery to arrest him. After entering the home, they looked for him on the first and second floors.

One officer went to the basement stairs and yelled for anyone who might be down there to come out.

Buie eventually emerged and climbed the basement stairs to be searched, handcuffed and arrested by the officers.

At that point, another officer descended the stairs to the basement where he saw a red running suit, similar to one a victim of the robbery said was worn by one of the holdup men.

The suit was introduced as evidence that helped convict Buie.

The Maryland Court of Appeals, the state's highest, ordered a new trial for Buie. By a 4-3 vote, the state court said Buie's rights protected by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution were violated because police lacked a search warrant and probable cause to search the basement.

Barry files innocent plea

WASHINGTON (AP) — Mayor Marion Barry pleaded innocent today to cocaine possession and perjury charges filed after a 14-month investigation of his ties to a convicted drug dealer.

At the brief hearing, U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson set trial for Barry on three felony charges of lying to a grand jury and five misdemeanor cocaine possession charges.

The mayor's attorney, R. Kenneth Mundy, said in a statement outside the courthouse afterward that Barry was "anticipating the trial and anticipating winning the trial."

Mundy said there would be no plea bargaining and Barry would not resign from public office.

Barry, who has denied ever using cocaine or other drugs, has been undergoing treatment at substance abuse centers in Florida and South Carolina for what aides have said is alcoholism.

Barry entered the courthouse through a side door and held up two fingers in a "victory" sign.

Barry and his wife Effi had difficulty entering the building for a court appearance on Jan. 19, the day after he was arrested, because of a crush of reporters and camera crews.

Several members of the Guardian Angels, an anti-crime patrol group, carried signs calling for Barry's resignation outside the courthouse today. One sign read, "Do The Right Thing - Resign."

Barry arrived in the nation's capital Tuesday from the Fenwick Hall hospital outside Charleston, S.C., where he is enrolled in a substance abuse treatment program.

The charges stem from an investigation into Barry's ties to a convicted drug dealer. One possession charge involved the mayor's Jan. 18 arrest in an FBI sting operation at a downtown Washington hotel.

If convicted of all charges filed against him, the mayor could face a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine.

GSS supports grad student work stoppage

By MARGARET McATEER
Collegian Correspondent

The Graduate Student Senate Tuesday voted 24-11 to endorse the one-day boycott of classes by graduate students scheduled for today.

The motion encouraged graduate students to use the time to participate in picket lines, the noon rally and the Graduate Employee Organization general meeting.

Sen. Gerald McCausland, also a GEO coordinating committee member, said the major goal of the work stoppage is to attain collective bargaining power.

He said the administration was willing to make an agreement where the GEO could bargain on every issue except money issues from the Board of Regents.

McCausland added that this agreement would have been non-binding. "There was no mechanism in the agreement to enforce the agreement," he said.

Sen. Gordon Kieffer questioned the administration's agreement. "Aren't we assuming before the fact that the University will make a bunch of fat promises and then renege?" he asked.

McCausland said, "Our only way to enforce power is to hold back our labor. Look at the history of this University, no one trusts anyone and for good reason."

GSS Vice President Pierre Laliberte said, "The only reason for having a union is to have binding agreements and the GEO has been the only group to grab some concessions from the administration."

In other GSS business: $500 was allocated to MassPIRG to sponsor speaker Cesar Chavez, $285 was allocated to Palestine Solidarity for a slide show and lecture on "Children of the Infantida" and $100 was allocated to UMass Greens to cover honorarium for speakers.

MSP to organize rally and teach-in

By COLLEEN JOYCE
Collegian Staff

The executive board of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, the faculty union at the University of Massachusetts, voted yesterday to organize a two-day information and education session April 11-12 to discuss the effects of the budget crisis on Massachusetts higher education. John Cole, president of MSP, said the event is still in the planning stages, but added there is a tentative plan for a teach-in on April 11.

The teach-in would consist of information sessions and classes touching on the various aspects of the budget crisis, he said.

A Boston trip is planned for April 12 with the goal "to bring the message from the State House to us," Cole said.

Although the trip is still in the early stages of development, Cole said he expects anywhere from 10,000 to 20,000 people.

"There were [that many people] last October at the rally in Boston, I don't see any reason why there would be fewer this time," he said.

Cole said professors, students, alumni, and administrators from across the state are expected to travel to Boston for the rally.

Provost appears before SGA: responds to vital student concerns

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Provost O'Brien appeared before a meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate on invitation from the Academic Affairs committee to answer questions concerning vital student issues.

"I am very, very pleased to be here tonight," said O'Brien.

He took the opportunity to commend the efforts put forth by the Academic Affairs committee in its role as liason between students and the administration.

"The communication between students and the administration has been very good these past few months," O'Brien said.

One of the first questions, submitted by the Senate body one week ago, dealt with a statement made by O'Brien during the May 4, 1989 Faculty Senate meeting, in which he was quoted as referring to student protestors as "wards" of the University.

O'Brien said, during this meeting a faculty member had questioned why the administration was carrying on discussions with "lawbreakers."

"I said these young men and women had serious concerns on their minds and they were our wards," he said, explaining that this only meant the University owed them a sense of responsibility.

"If they were illy chosen words, you must forgive me," he said.

Concerning University decisions regarding what campus areas the state budget cuts affect, O'Brien said the cuts are "central decisions," and affect a broad area of campus. "The academic budget is three-quarters of the full budget [of the University], so there will be big-sized cuts from this area."

He explained in detail that no substantial decisions are made without careful investigations.

Citing his first priority regarding student safety, O'Brien said, "This University has to be a place where you can live in safety. Nothing has shocked this University [into realizing this] as much as the murder of Sharon Galligan."

In other SGA business:

- Treasurer Laura Filkins submitted a Trust-Fund Management Recommendation to the Senate that would reduce the funding of Board of Governors, create a sizeable increase in Greek Area monies, and would keep allocations to the four residential areas (excluding Southwest) stabilized.

The recommendation is the result of thousands of hours of research on the part of a student-staff committee, said Filkins.

- Greek Area Sen. Natasha Diephuis, and Orchard Hill Sen. Ken Parker announced their candidacies for SGA president.
- Kathy Lemay formally withdrew form the race for SGA president based upon personal reasons.

ROTC prohibits homosexuals

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Lesbian, bisexual and gay students are allowed to take miltary science classes at the University of Massachusetts, but are prohibited from joining the Reserve Officers Training Corps because of military restrictions that the Supreme Court upheld Monday, according to Major Moore, military science professor.

Specifically, Moore said an Army policy which states "homosexuality is incompatible with military service" and forbids "persons who engage in homosexual conduct or who by their statements demonstrate a propensity to engage in homosexual conduct."

Moore said any Five College student can take a course in the military science department at UMass regardless of race, sex or sexuality, but students must sign a contract with the Army if they wish to take part in Army activities outside of the classroom and Army standards apply.

"Students can't qualify for the ROTC program if they don't meet Army restrictions. There are physical, academic and training time standards, and the standard that we are following, as long as it stands, is that homosexuality is not allowed," he said. "We don't discriminate against against anyone."

Moore said to qualify to be an officer in the Army after ROTC training, a student must complete four years of training and attend leadership laboratories, which openly homosexual students are not allowed to participate in.

"A student can easily lie in their loyalty contract [signed with the army], but the contract is null and void if the truth is found out," Moore said. According to the Boston Globe, the Supreme Court, without comment, refused to hear ap-

Druze historian to speak

Lecturer will focus on minorities in Israel

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Dr. Jaber Abu-Rukun, author of Brotherhood That Withstood the Times, a history of Jewish/Druze relations, is scheduled to speak at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center on "Minorities in Israel."

Dr. Abu-Rukun, an Israeli Druze historian and member of the Druze Zionist Council, plans to discuss the relations of the Israeli government from a Druze perspective.

Adnan Haydar, UMass professor of Near East studies, said only about 150,000 Druze people are dwelling in Israel.

"The Druze, unlike the other Arabs, seem to have cooperated with the Israeli government," he said. "[The Druze] have a privileged position over in [Israel] because of they operate with the government."

"Where ever [the Druze] are found, they are loyal to the government of the country in which they live," he said. "Many are active in the military."

There are only some 500,000 Druze people residing in the countries of Israel, Lebanon and Syria, he said.

"They are a very small minority in the world," he said.

Haydar explained that the Druze religion is an offshoot of the Islam religion, but is quite different.

"The Druze name was taken from the man who started the religion within the Islam religion, which has many sects," he said. The Druze followers left their homeland of Egypt and went to Israel, Syria and Lebanon.

Haydar said few people are familiar with the religion because it is "very closed" and esoteric. "It is known only by adherents of the religion," he said.

An unprecedented chance for peace

The settlement of one of the world's most intractable conflicts appears more accessible now than in living memory. The deeply felt and intensely volatile conflict between the Palestinians and Israelis has a plausible and viable solution.

The international community, the P.L.O. and the Israeli Labor Party all agree that a solution of land for peace can achieve this goal. The latter two also agree that the result should be the establishment of a Palestinian state on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the acceptance of Israel by the Arab world.

Clearly, this is an unprecedented chance for peace.

If the result of such concessions were the comprehensive peace envisioned, then the military requirements of the nation would be greatly reduced. The hard-line Israeli logic is, therefore, circular; holding on to the territories for political ends creates the supposed military need to do so.

The greatest possible cause for any future Arab-Israeli war would be Israel's continued occupation of the territories and conflict with the Palestinians.

Hussein Ibish

Further, the notion that Israel would be unable to defend itself against any Middle Eastern enemies is absurd. At the very least, Israel, with its considerable nuclear arsenal, can impose a condition of mutual destruction on any such enemies.

This correctly implies that any future large scale Arab-Israeli conflict is likely to be a missile war of unprecedented carnage.

It must be remembered that Israel gained control of these territories in an aggressive war in 1967, which the Israeli armed forces began with a surprise Pearl Harbor-style attack on Egyptian, Syrian, Iraqi and Jordanian airfields.

Not least of all is the question of the Palestinians themselves. Having at last abandoned their demand for a democratic, non-racial, secular state in Palestine (for all who live in it), they have swallowed the bitter pill of accepting two racially-divided states.

For them, justice in full is utterly impossible. But, the total denial of their national rights in Palestine, even in the small part of it represented in the territories, cannot be maintained. There are about three and a half million Israelis and five and a half million Palestinians. Shall the Israelis have control of all of Palestine, the Palestinians remaining to be forever subjects, and those in exile never able to return?

Is the colonial settler community once again to totally displace and oppress the indigenous people?

The alternative to "land for peace" is likely to be a war that will be among the worst that mankind has known, if we can judge by the arsenals of the parties and the lessons of history.

Arabs and Israelis — we will live together or, most assuredly, we will die together.

You could also work for a major city hospital or a local fine arts museum.

Maryanne Martin

The opportunities are limitless. But how do you do it? Well, it's just about as easy as a quick walk to Curry Hicks.

The University Internship Program, located right on campus, has much more to offer than you can imagine. And, after my personal experience last fall, I don't know how anyone could pass up this opportunity.

Last semester I did an internship for 15 credits at WNEV-TV, Channel 7, Boston's CBS affiliate. What I learned could never be taught in any classroom, seminar or lecture hall.

What I learned was the "real" stuff. I found out what the television business is all about and what it takes to make it.

My internship was in Promotion and Advertising, and I could have never asked to work with a nicer group of people. The producers took me in and accepted me as one of their own. They gave me unlimited freedom to explore, learn and contribute.

Last fall I did more than I ever dreamed I would. I went on commercial film shoots, I produced radio spots and station promos, I was even in commercials. . . I could go on and on.

For a while, I was "in" the business, and it felt great. For the first time I could finally see me life coming together. All I had prepared for, all I had strived to be, was now becoming excitingly real.

I was no longer just a UMass student, I was a professional. I took my position seriously, and was treated with the same respect.

At the end of my internship, Channel 7 hired me on a free-lance basis for over a month. I was given more responsibility, more challenges and my resume tape began to fill up quickly.

However, soon enough, it was time to leave "TV world" and come back to school for my final semester. And believe me, I walked out of those doors holding back tears.

I've now quickly readjusted to student life, and I'll admit, it's good to be back. But when I think about my experience, it fills me with glowing feelings of satisfaction and confidence. I have no doubt that interning was the best thing I've done during my four years at school.

I've prepared myself for the world in a way that classes never could. And most importantly, I'm no longer afraid of the future. Somewhere there's a job for me, and now I know I'm qualified.

It's never too late to do an internship.

There are placements for all majors, full time or part time, all over the country. So, take a few minutes to stop by the Internship Program.

You may find yourself enrolling in the course of your life.

Reconciliation removes doubt

I have a really difficult time swallowing the arrogance of Bradley Heintz's column, ("The consequences of 'just knowing,'" Feb. 2).

Does Mr. Heintz think? Has he ever read Mein Kampf? Does he have any understanding of the ideas he is discussing?

To say that Hitler "just knew" is incredibly ignorant and arrogant. Although Hitler's philosophy was unspeakably evil, if you accept the presupposition of there being a human life not worth living, many of Hitler's arguments are not illogical. This presupposition is not found only in Hitler, however.

This is the reasoning that allows many abortions today and some pro-lifers to ignore the needs of women in crisis pregnancies. It also justifies apartheid and permits any person to put their individual needs over another's.

Maybe Mr. Heintz's "frenzy sickness" could be cured by honest, unbiased reasoning, not rationalizations to justify his own arrogance and semblance of security. His self-righteousness (emphasis on self) is amazing.

Who is he to judge the entire human race for its stupidity in not agreeing with him?

As a Christian, I did not grow up in the church. I came to my "ideology" through a rational process. Quite simply, the claims of Jesus Christ fit. He answers all the questions I was asking, and even a few I hadn't let myself admit I was asking.

Jesus said to seek, to ask and to search. Doubt, however, is useful only as far as it actually leads to something. Have you actually reached any conclusions, or are you just stuck in the process?

To live a lifestyle of doubt is to invite trouble and instability. Rather, we need to reconcile ourselves to God, and allow ourselves to explore and question the amazing world we have been put in.

The collegiate version of Murphy's Law

Who is Murphy? Who is he? Is he like Mother Nature or Father Time or Baby Huey? Is he a she or she a he? Why isn't his or her or its observations a Bill instead of a Law?

Murphy's Law. The tyranny of irony. The pinnacle of cynical. The empirical of satirical. I have met Mr. slash Mrs. Murphy. I've seen 'em in action. We've often had lunch.

I've been pitching in this ballgame of life for a few innings now, and I've often been benched by this mysterious force, Murphy's Law. I've learned that this Law truly exists (if only to irritate like dandruff) and that it exists at the Collegiate level, striving and flourishing unlike our budget. Here is my proof.

People.

If there are acquaintances on campus whose company brings you any sort of pleasure at all, you will see them as often as a pen pal in Yugoslavia. They will sometimes come out of invisibility (like Koolaid) but when you do see them, you will always be desperately late for a life and death (yet often stupid) appointment.

You will humor each other with such programmed responses as "I'll call you" or the no longer funny, "We'll do lunch." Neither one of you will call or do lunch except by extreme accident and when you do meet again (once again drifting apart and shouting from 100 yards away), your failure to keep promises will be your only topic of conversation.

By the same token, if there are people you loathe, despise or make you even vaguely nauseous, you will see them constantly and continuously on the farthest corner reaches of the campus and beyond. It doesn't matter when or where. It can be E-Lot at 4 a.m., the Library on a Saturday night or Louis' Foods during Spring Break.

Josh Galitsky

And you will always be looking your most repulsive and feeling your utmost hostile.

Time is another component of Murphy's Law that makes it so true and profound. When you need to be there like a Federal Express package, suddenly people crawl out of the woodwork and creep their way along the campus biways like snails on codeine.

When you finally attempt to pass, you have to fiddle and diddle your way through the oncoming traffic, avoiding a major undergrad pileup. On your slow days, at least you have the decency to get out of someone's way, don't you? Don't you?

Time and Murphy's Law are best buddies. They plot and plan little schemes to help us forget stuff and pull our hair out. Like the Things to do list that resembles a scroll from the Holy Scriptures (a Torah of Tasks one might say) in the morning? By sunset, everything on the scroll is crossed out, except the things you had to absolutely get done under penalty of flogging.

Academics are also addressed in the scriptures.

All classes that you have difficulty with will meet in a leaky, poorly lit, overcrowded lecture hall and the professor will have an unusual accent you have never been exposed to.

All classes you don't need will be taught by a professor more boring than John Houseman in The Paper Chase.

All classes that meet at 8 a.m. will take attendance and will be located at the farthest possible point from your bedroom.

All classes meeting on Friday during Spring semester will drop you two grades lower than if you took it in the Fall. The climate also decides how many points your cumulative average will plummet.

Our social lives are affected, too. All off-campus parties will be decided on excellent male/female ratio, good music, endless supply of beer and (taking honorable mention) reliable bus arrival. The commandment states that none of these things shall coincide at the same party during one's college career.

Murphy's Law. Anything that can happen. . . will. That's not so bad. After all, I can win Megabucks, can't I? Can't I?

Self-righteousness can be criminal

It looks like the Young Americans for Freedom is hot on the heels of slander once again.

Bright young chap, Ted Maravelias put up a sign reading Homosexuality is criminal.

A student who works at Earthfoods, Sarah Getoff, ripped it down because she found it to be offensive. Marvelias called the police and asked them to fight his battle. Getoff is now being taken to court for infringing on his right to exercise the First Amendment.

Why are Young Americans for Freedom going to court?

This case is a waste of taxpayers' money. And why must they insist on publicly displaying their ignorance? Some Republicans are African-American, Jewish and even gay.

When Ted Maravelias lost his innocence to the media last semester, he managed to offend people with his views on everything from abortion to women's issues. I had a smidgen of respect for the man, for he actually had the nerve to pontificate about his brand of rhetoric.

Though I laughed at the things he had to say, my reaction didn't go much beyond that. This is a free country where people can and should express opinions no matter what they are.

However, there is a fine line between expressing one's freedom of speech and expressing hatred by preaching untruths and instilling fears in the innocent.

What you wrote for all to read was Homosexuality is criminal not "It is the belief of all members of the Young Americans for Freedom that homosexuality is an unacceptable sexual practice." The difference between these two statements is vast.

Saad Hopkins

What you implied was that you would persecute, or even harm a human being for practicing an act you consider abhorable.

That implication uses the same kind of fascist thinking that Hitler used to slay millions of people. There are those who believe that homosexuality is unnatural, though they really wouldn't put a stop to it. And even if they could do something to stop it, they wouldn't.

"Do onto others as you would have they do onto you." Where were you when that lesson was taught?

Ignorance is nothing to lose one's sanity over, and it should be ignored because adding fuel to the fire just causes everyone to get burned. There are more important things in life than listening to a bunch of misinformed, close-minded fundamentalists. But this time you got me.

Homosexuality is not criminal!!! Much like musical taste, it is all preference. No one wakes up in the morning and says, "Duh! Gee, I think I'm going to be gay." I happen to be a Black Jewish, homosexual American who is proud to be so.

All that your ignorant views say to me is that twenty years ago a person with these views would have probably called me a "Nigger" or my boyfriend a "Jap chink" or a member of my congregation a "Kike," using the same excuse for justification.

What are you going to say next?

AIDS is God's punishment against gays? Or that only gays get AIDS?

Or that the Native Americans should have been killed because they attempted to stop us from developing the country into the moral cesspool it is now?

Or that Jews will go to hell because they haven't accepted Christ?

The next time you feel you must publicly take a stand about anything, watch what you say and why. Recognize the fine line between saying things as if to share your opinions with someone, and sticking your foot up your ass!

A colluded calendar quandary

Just a guess, but I wouldn't be at all surprised if Rodney Dangerfield was born around this time of year.

Here we are, having just arrived in Month No. 3 of the new year (No. 9, if you're a yuppie who quotes the Wall Street Journal and thinks life begins in July). And I can't help but feel strange when March 1 rolls around.

I suppose there are a few reasons for it. Usually by now, I can no longer justify a tolerance for winter. The wonder of indoor hockey rinks helps satisfy any lasting need for cold for the next three months, while Mother Nature soothes us with warmer weather for lacrosse and baseball.

But for me, the quandary stretches beyond that. I can't truly dread March — mainly because it was the month I came into this world (note: send your cards now before the rush), and the same month that I leave it for a couple of weeks while the NCAA hoop tournament occupies most of my dwindling grey matter.

But there's something here that's just not right. So allow me now to purge my brain of a couple of pet peeves.

First of all, I never read the horoscope. I was never one to be superstitious about anything, but people insist on preaching the cosmic way to me as if it were the secret to life. Sorry, moon creatures. Whereas my daily readings usually consist of "finances" or "romance" — both of which I have very little to work with — I find it hard to take such drivel seriously.

Jim Clark

But while we're on the subject, let me pose a query. Why is it that Pisces is at the bottom of the horoscope every day? And what makes Jeanne Dixon more of an expert on the stars than Carl Sagan?

I'll tell ya, we fish, we get no respect at all [SHRUG. TWITCH.]

What else bothers me? This day in particular, actually.

A long, long, loooong time ago — way before the founding of the PSRU — it was discovered that we, indeed, live in an imperfect world. Never mind that nobody could figure out this planet was actually round, or anything like that. I can accept such minute discrepancies in judgment.

I guess I should blame a teacher of mine. Kindergarten, I think, or maybe it was English 112. Whoever. As wide-eyed school kids, we were all taught this cute little poem that helps us remember the months. For those of you who remember, feel free to sing along:

Thirty days hath September, April, June and November

All the rest have 31, EXCEPT . . .

February. That month that a) nobody can spell correctly; and b) nobody can figure out.

Herein, lies the rub of said argument.

How many days are there in February? Twenty-eight? Twenty-nine? Forty-seven? I don't know.

All I know is that, when someone decided to invent "the year" (real year, fiscal year — in this case, it doesn't matter), they missed by about six hours. Not a lot, unless you're waiting for the South Amherst bus on a cold day.

But enough to screw up everything. If you have one of those watches that show the date and the day, you know what I mean when you have to figure out how to reset the fool thing when Feb. 29 decides to pop up, whenever that is.

And what if you're born on that rare day (like Dick Albert, the weather guy for Channel 5 in Boston)? When is your birthday? How old are you? Answers, I need answers.

I mean, is this fair? Certain people born on Dec. 25 can celebrate their birthday and Christmas at the same time. People born on Feb. 29 don't know when to celebrate it.

Oh well, I suppose it could be worse. They could be born on April 1, if you know what I mean.

Letters to the Editor

Critical analysis abandoned

Darren Garnick made some extremely misleading statements in his column, "A closer look at the map (Feb. 21)" that I would like to address.

Garnick listed 21 countries, including some improbable candidates, like Algeria and Tunisia, as neighbors of Israel. What you will find strange is how Algeria and Tunisia can be neighbors of Israel when they are about 1,800 miles away. If that kind of radius defines neighboring countries, then Italy, Greece, Albania, Turkey and the U.S.S.R. should fall into that category.

However, the only ones Garnick chose to mention were Arab-Muslim countries. From this I can only conclude that he was using his column, thinly disguised as an objective opinion, to engage in Arab-bashing.

With his assertion that the Arab League "is dedicated to Israeli euthanasia," Garnick is implying that Israel is weak and sickly, at the mercy of the League's efforts. I think the general public realizes that Israel is not unarmed. Besides, the United States would not let her client state fall, despite the shift in popular opinion away from support of Israel.

The obvious question is why the Arab League plots against Israel, if indeed it does. If the answer isn't clear, just look at the map — right where it says occupied territories.

Garnick goes on to make an inconceivable connection between Yasser Arafat's acceptance of United Nations Resolution 242 and the belief that if Arafat really cared about the safety of Israel he would "carve his state somewhere else."

Supposedly, Israel's safety is not Arafat's concern. Does that mean, conversely, that Palestinians aren't Israel's concern? You would have to wonder, again just looking at the map.

The underlying issue here is the total abandonment of critical analysis. What I found disheartening was an opinion fed to the public as fact. This contributes nothing to the conflict, except to implant in readers a back-against-the-wall mentality that Israel itself has used since its creation to procure U.S. support. Without the fostering of alternative thought, we succumb to propaganda served as news, or worse, as the only correct view.

Cutting into area governments necessary

Students, especially Southwest residents, take note: this is about your money.

Recently, there have been reports against the Student Government Association concerning a proposed cut in the budgets of Area Governments. Southwest Area Government claims it will lose Southwest Week and calls the cut a "massacre."

The SGA is doing its job by cutting the Area Government Budget in order to combat reckless spending and avoid a proposed fee increase (on your bill) by the Massachusetts Legislature.

In the past, Area Governments have spent more money on answering machines, payroll, and cold cuts than student activities.

SWAG president and candidate for Student Trustee, Bob Monaghan, is backing a referendum to raise Area Government allocation to more than $100,000 in Southwest, with proportional increases for other Areas.

Giving this money to Area Governments would wreak havoc on funding for Registered Student Organizations and services.

The SGA is currently trying to revamp their budget and make it more efficient and activity oriented. Misinformation campaigns, like the SWAG proposal, are only clouding the matter.

Undergraduates: remember last semester

When the undergraduates of UMass went on strike last semester, there was one factor that allowed us to be effective in our efforts to be heard.

That factor was the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO). The GEO not only came to our aid with moral support, they organized the unions on campus to rally behind our cause, and they risked their jobs, to hold a work stoppage and support us.

Now comes payback time.

The graduate students won't be working today. They may be forced to hold a more significant strike action if their concerns are not addressed.

Our T.A.'s need us to tell them we support what they are doing. They need our empathy because they are risking more than we did. They work here, and if they lose their jobs, they lose their tuition waivers, their opportunity to earn a degree.

But most of all, they need us to walk their picket lines with them, as they did for us, and join them in their struggle to be recognized.

Harsh messages in state education

What is the public education system really teaching us?

Aside from the subjects that are listed as a given curriculum, there are some extremely harsh messages that we receive inside our public schools, just by having to be there:

"We do not trust you to constructively exercise your freedom of choice; you must rely on the guidance of state authorities; the importance of your personal interests is irrelevant compared to the subjects assigned to you; you are intelligent and good when you conform to the judgments of your 'superiors'; you are ignorant and bad when you do not conform to the judgments of your 'superiors.'

Our Constitution is designed to recognize and protect every person's inherent capacity for governing their own lives. Yet the government-run education program trains us to distrust our effectiveness in doing just that, while affirming that we should rely on the dictates of the state and not on ourselves.

Should the government be allowed to decide what we should learn, how we should learn it, where we should learn it, and who should teach us?

It seems even more incredible that most states have laws that force us to submit to a program of government instruction throughout our childhood years, often defined as the most impressionable time of our lives.

This is stuff of which dictatorships are made, not democracies.

Unless, of course, the majority allows it to happen. Even a totalitarian state can be a democracy if the majority wants it (or is trained to believe they have no other choice.)

But how many parents are aware that, through the laws of compulsory education, they are in effect being told that "you are not to be trusted to educate your children properly?" How many have come to believe it is true?

Books, periodicals, computers, telephone, radio, TV, video and audio tapes, letters, talking, and listening and doing — all are ways of acquiring information, and of passing that information on from one person to the next.

Somewhere along the line we've adopted the idea that if a parent, friend, sibling or neighbor shows a child how to use these things, or if a child learns it on their own, that it's not as valid as being "educated" by the government's public education system.

"Education" and "state education" are not synonymous, despite the number of years we are compelled to learn otherwise.

Classic jazz meets today's technology

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

The tidal wave of digitally remastered jazz reissues continues unabated. The current reissue boom includes all of the surviving major labels of jazz since the inception of the LP. This trend is so monumental that it seems like the entire history of modern jazz is being laid out for us on little silver platters. But while some of these labels are faithfully presenting jazz history, others are attempting to rewrite it.

Consider two recently-released reissues on Impulse and CBS. The former is a sampler of their third series of reissues called The Impulse Sampler, Vol. 3: Fire Into Music, while the latter is a reissue of Miles Davis' 1961 album Someday My Prince Will Come. Briefly, Impulse are the good guys, while CBS are the bad guys.

For a while, it seemed to me that the bulk of these labels' reissue programs had been devoted to the music of the '50s and '60s known as "hard bop." That is, the reissues have been "shadowing" the kind of music that neo-traditionalists like Wynton Marsalis are playing today. The record companies have been omitting the music of the early '50s and before, though this is understandable since most of those labels weren't around then. However, they had also been omitting the so-called "free" music of the '60s. Such an attitude is reflective of the conservative ideals of the current jazz industry in general, and I don't like it. However, enter Impulse records, arguably the most influential label of the '60s avant-garde. Their first two samplers were haphazard, having neither historical nor musical focus. But their latest sampler has dispelled many of my fears that the major labels are effectively playing Ministry of Information and rewriting jazz history to suit their money-making needs.

Vatley Jazz

This excellent LP represents a series of reissues that includes some of the most way-out, uncompromising music ever recorded under the rubric of jazz: John Coltrane's Om, Pharoah Sanders' Karma, Albert Ayler's In Greenwich Village and Archie Shepp's Fire Music are among them. The selections are very reminiscent of a sampler Impulse released in 1972 called No Energy Crisis, which also belied the notion of the anthology as "greatest hits" selection.

The Fire Into Music dares to shock and challenge the complacent CD-buying populace that has been inundated with new age and so-called "traditional" jazz. Wow! Slip this disc into the CD player of an unsuspecting Wyntonophile and watch the fun begin. Hotcha!

CBS' Miles Davis reissue, however, is another story. It is yet another of CBS' repeated attempts to milk Miles' short-term involvement with hard bop music on that label for all it's worth (his important hard bop recordings were on Prestige in the mid-'50s). In the early '60s, Miles went through a period that most agree is among his least creative ever, and the incompatible presence of tenor saxophonist Hank Mobley was no help. Yet CBS seems bent on reissuing all of the music from this weak period.

Thus, as with previous CBS reissues of Miles' 1961 concerts at Carnegie Hall and the Blackhawk in San Francisco, Someday My Prince Will Come is mostly forgettable marginalia, except for the title track, on which John Coltrane steps in as guest soloist; Coltrane had left Miles' band a couple of years before this date and was invited to come into the studio for the day. CBS would do much better to rescue Miles' stellar mid-'60s albums (with Wayne Shorter, Herbie Hancock, Tony Wiliams and Ron Carter) from cutout-bin oblivion.
